The right to strike is not absolute; the government has a right to designate people in bargaining units who are essential to public safety and are forbidden to strike. And for some groups of workers, the option of a strike is impractical.

Canadians found, too, that U.S. unions have made enormous organizing progress in the federal sector since the last bi-national conference—despite widespread dissatisfaction with the limitations on collective bargaining and union rights.

AFL-CIO Organizing Director William L. Kircher spoke to that point in a major address to the conference.

He noted that 92 percent of representation elections among federal employes were won by unions last year—compared with about 55 percent in the private sector.

But, Kircher stressed, outside of the postal service "the maze of restrictions, the kid-glove destructiveness of executive orders . . . prevent unions in the federal sector from translating their organizational attainments into proper and justifiable collective bargaining progress."

In a similar vein, Service Employes Vice Pres. Thomas R. Donahue, a former assistant Secretary of Labor, commented:

"We have created an elaborate framework for collective bargaining," he said of the U.S. pattern, "but then have so hedged-in the bargainers . . . that we may have created more frustrations and less bargaining than under many simpler systems."

Merger Plan Rejected:

Brewery Workers Boost Per Capita

Miami Beach—Delegates to the 27th convention of the Brewery Workers raised the union's per capita income to meet rising costs, voted down merger with the Machinists and returned their top leadership to office for another three years.

The convention voted a two-step increase in union income to keep servicing and organizing programs effective in coping with cost inflation and raids by the Teamsters and other unions. The increases are to go into effect next Jan. 1 and a year later.

Early in the convention week, the 270 delegates from 157 local unions in the United States and Canada, overwhelmingly rejected a proposal to merge with the IAM.

The merger was one of several alternatives considered by the brewery union since the last convention in 1968. The vote to increase per capita payments was another indication of the delegates' desire to remain autonomous despite recent employment declines in the brewing industry, the officers said.

The union, which describes itself as the oldest continuing industrial-type union in the labor movement, was founded 85 years ago in Baltimore. It has 61,000 members.

This year's convention, devoted strictly to union business, did not schedule any speeches by political candidates or labor spokesmen during four days of working sessions. The entire time was devoted to reports, decisions, and resolutions on major issues.

Convention issues "hinged on trying to deal with the problems we face" as a union, Pres. Karl F. Feller said. The union's head since 1949, Feller was re-elected along with Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea and Director of Organization Thomas M. Rusch.

Five new members of the executive board were elected to fill vacancies. They are John Schaefer of Baltimore, Louis Zaccagni of Philadelphia, John Adam of Milwaukee, Ralph Waymier of San Antonio and Louis Lacroix of Montreal.

Three incumbent board members declined to run, and two retired from office. They are Thomas Owens, Boston, and William J. Lawler, Allentown, Pa. New terms were voted for five incumbents—Anthony Sapienza, Cleveland; Harold H. Bondy, Detroit; John Vutich, Kansas City; Donald Sperr, St. Paul, and Harold C. Woolley, Winnipeg, Man.

Among major resolutions approved was one supporting the National Health Security Bill which has the backing of the organized labor movement. Chief sponsors are Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.).

A major portion of convention time was spent in restructuring the union's organizing regions "for more effective operation." The convention also dropped from the constitution and bylaws a requirement that the officers of the Brewery Workers must investigate all merger possibilities. Instead the matter of investigation was left to the discretion of the union heads.

The delegates voted for changes in the executive board that were called the most extensive in 20 years.

Another mark was set in the makeup of this year's delegates as more than 25 percent represented Canadian locals.

C. J. Haggerty Dies, Led Building Trades

Los Angeles—Cornelius J. (Neil) Haggerty, who headed the California State Federation of Labor and later the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. in a 43-year career of trade union leadership, died at his home near here after a long illness. He was 77.

Funeral services were held Oct. 13 at St. Theresa of Avila Church. He is survived by his wife Margaret and two sons, Cornelius J., Jr., and Donald P. Haggerty.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland sent a message of sympathy saying "he was a true friend, a fine gentleman and one of the most dedicated and devoted trade unionists of our time. All of us in the trade union movement share your sorrow and your loss."

Haggerty was a vigorous and influential head of the building trades department from 1960 until May 6, 1971, when he retired after 56 years of labor activity in Boston, Los Angeles and Washington, D.C.

Born in Boston into a family of 17 children, Haggerty was 21 when he got a job in the construction industry and joined Lathers Local 72. Six years later he moved to California and transferred to Lathers Local 42, Los Angeles.

His talent for leadership and persuasion led him up the ladder of union responsibility. He was elected business manager of Local 42 in 1928, vice president of the Lathers international union a year later, secretary of the Los Angeles Building & Construction Trades Council in 1933, a vice president of the California AFL in 1936, then successively president of the State AFL, secretary-treasurer of the same body, first vice president of the Lathers, secretary-treasurer of the merged State AFL-CIO, and finally president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades.

When the department's executive council announced his retirement five months ago, it accepted his decision "with reluctance" and memorialized his term in office as one of "excellence and distinction." It chose Frank Bonadio, veteran secretary-treasurer, to succeed Haggerty, and Robert Georgine, president of the Lathers, to take Bonadio's post.

As chief executive officer of the California AFL-CIO, Haggerty was credited with helping cement the unity of the merged labor movement.

He was the first union man to be named a regent of the University of California—in 1950 and again in 1966.

During four presidential administrations, Haggerty was chief spokesman for the nation's construction workers, who are represented by 17 international unions.

On the federal level, he was until he became ill, a member of the President's Committee on Youth Employment, the Federal Advisory Council on Apprenticeship & Training, the President's Committee for Traffic Safety, the Missile Site Labor Commission and other bodies.

Labor Gains Nixon Pay Board Pledge

accord with the council position. Both said they would serve on the Pay Board if asked.

Meany told reporters in reply to questions that:

- A no strike-pledge was neither asked by the Administration nor given by the unions.
- The federation is not pledging that affiliated unions will accept any decision of the Pay Board especially on the question of retroactive or deferred pay increases. "We are telling the President we are going to serve on this board and try to make it work, try to be helpful. But we are certainly not binding our unions to accept something they might consider unfair."
- The President's goal of reducing inflation to 2 to 3 percent by the end of 1972 is "a little ambitious. I think that if he got it down to 4 percent he would think he had some kind of a success. . . . We would like to see it come down because it would solve a lot of problems for us. After all, our members are consumers, too."

The council meeting was called by Meany on Oct. 8 in a statement which said that "interpretations of the President's program, given to newsmen by the White House subsequent to the briefing given labor officials yesterday, are in conflict with interpretations given us at that briefing. They raise serious questions which I believe must be explored thoroughly by the leaders of the American labor movement."

The briefing for labor leaders indicated that the tripartite Pay Board, to be made up of five members each representing labor, management and the public, would be autonomous and have veto-proof powers to rule on cases as well as standards and criteria.

The briefings for newsmen indicated that the Pay Board's powers to set standards would be limited and subject to approval or disapproval by the Cost of Living Council. A televised news conference the following day by Treasury Sec. John B. Connally, chairman of the COLC, did not clear up the situation. Connally indicated that the Pay Board's authority would be subject to review and that in effect its decisions could be vetoed.

The President's memorandum, delivered to Meany by Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson and George P. Shultz, head of the Office of Management & Budget, summarized the roles of the COLC and Pay Board and the Price Commission and was the basis for the council's action.

Pres. Nixon issued a statement after the council meeting welcoming the participation of organized labor in "the work of the Pay Board and in helping make the nation's efforts at price and wage stabilization succeed. . . . The leaders of organized labor have acted in the best interests of their own members and of the nation."

Meany, who had indicated in a Labor Day interview with reporters that labor would not buy a plan that included unions as "window-dressing," traced at his news conference the steps that led up to the question of the autonomy of the Pay Board.

"On Thursday morning we were assured by Mr. Hodgson that this Pay Board would have complete autonomy in every way. We went to the White House and Mr. Shultz briefed the Productivity group of which we were a part on this whole thing, and he did nothing to change our minds as to the information given us by Hodgson. And we were prepared on Thursday afternoon—in fact we had already prepared a statement assuring the President we would try to cooperate in this fight against inflation.

"But then Thursday evening we had some misgivings because of the briefings given by Mr. Shultz to the news media, to the TV people as well as the press, and we heard the announcements early Thursday evening that there would be a veto. Subsequently we were told that this was it—there was a veto over standards, not over individual decisions. And I would like to point out that if the Cost of Living Council had the right to make the final decision on the standards by which the Pay Board would operate, there certainly would be no necessity for them to review individual decisions which were made on those standards.

"And on Friday afternoon we listened to Sec. Connally, and although it took him a long time to answer the question, I did get the impression that that was a veto. However, this morning we got this document from Mr. Hodgson and Mr. Shultz with the President's OK on it as of last evening, and that, of course, cleared the matter up."

Sitting in at the Executive Council meeting were IBEW Pres. Charles H. Pillard; Plumbers & Pipe Fitters Pres. Martin J. Ward; Frank Bonadio, president, Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Peter McGavin, executive secretary-treasurer, Maritime Trades Dept.; Edward (Bud) Murphy, secretary-treasurer, Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Francis Filbey, president, Postal Workers Union; Bricklayers Pres. Thomas F. Murphy; Teachers Pres. David Selden; John O'Donnell, president, Air Line Pilots; Ed S. Miller, president, Hotel & Restaurant Employes; Letter Carriers Pres. James Rademacher; Retail Clerks Pres. James T. Housewright; Patrick E. Gorman, secretary-treasurer, Meat Cutters.

AN OVERFLOW news conference hears AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany explain labor's role in the Administration's post-freeze program after it received personal assurances from Pres. Nixon that Pay Board decisions on standards and cases would not be vetoed by the Cost of Living Council.

Central Bodies Get Watchdog Role on Prices

dog units to enlist the active assistance of the wives of union members in these monitoring operations and cooperate in this effort with labor unions not affiliated with the AFL-CIO, with consumer organizations, senior citizen groups, civil rights organizations like the A. Philip Randolph Institute, church and civic organizations and other like-minded groups in your community.

"We need immediate action and widespread support to protect the nation from the price-gougers."

Meany said he had assigned responsibility for this activity to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services and that Director Leo Perlis "would assist the new units in the performance of these important functions."

In a separate letter to all 118 affiliated unions, Meany urged their help and cooperation. He specifically asked them to inform their locals and "solicit their full participation" in the watchdog units.

Strikers Reach La-Z-Boy Pact, Cancel Boycott

pany agreed to a consent election on union representation.

The consumer boycott campaign against the manufacturer of recliner chairs and other products was "extremely effective," said UFW Pres. Fred Fulford in a message of thanks to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. Fulford said "we never could have won without the tremendous support of the united labor movement."

Production and movement of company products slowed to a trickle during the don't buy campaign, launched in August by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and backed by a "full support" vote of the federation's Executive Council.

Unions and central labor bodies across the country joined in carrying the boycott message to the public. Union staff members, spearheaded by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization, gave "fantastic help," the Furniture Workers said.

When the strike started, only the 500 workers at the Monroe plant were under contract. The unit at Florence, which also has 500 employes, had voted for the union but could not win an agreement.

The contracts are for a three-year term, with wage increases ranging from 45 to 80 cents an hour at Monroe and a total of 50 cents at Florence.

Other benefits include increased pension and insurance coverage, two additional half holidays, and improved sick benefit coverage at Monroe. The Florence plant's first contract calls also for a fourth week of vacation, a grievance procedure "with teeth," and an agreement that all dues deduction cards previously signed will be treated as irrevocable, Fulford reported.

The Florence plant was the only one that used strikebreakers, the union said. They will be replaced by returning strikers under terms of the settlement.

Portland Teachers Vote for Union

Portland, Ore.—The American Federation of Teachers won bargaining rights for 3,600 public school teachers in one of the AFT's biggest election victories on the West Coast. Teachers gave the Portland Federation of Teachers 1,934 votes to 1,045 for the Portland affiliate of the National Education Association. The NEA unit had won a 1970 election by an 89-vote margin.

Global Alliance to Fight Corporate Exploitation

A close-working liaison between workers in the United States and other countries will be a big step in making the multinational corporations more honest in their dealings with employes and consumers, Rubber Workers Pres. Peter Bommarito stressed in a Washington news conference.

Bammarito made the point as he outlined actions taken at a recent World Rubber & Plastic Conference in Geneva, Switzerland. He is a vice president of the International Federation of Chemical & General Workers' Unions, which sponsored the conference.

A resolution adopted by the delegates at the Geneva meeting called for setting up World Worker Councils for each of the multinational corporations in rubber and allied industries, Bommarito reported.

Seven councils have been established and will immediately begin an exchange of information on wages, fringe benefits, working conditions and management attitudes, he added.

"We found out that the multinationals are talking out of both sides of their corporate mouths. They're playing their workers in one country against workers in their plants in other countries, all for the purpose of lining their pockets with more money," Bommarito charged.

He gave this example:

"In Italy a multinational shoe company recently told its workers, those who are making about $1.10 an hour, that their wages are too high and their productivity is too low and if they don't shape up, 44 percent of the plant's production will be moved to the United States.

"Isn't that ironic? They tell workers in the United States the same thing—that production will be shifted to Italy or to some other low-wage country."

Bommarito said that the ICF resolution also called for unions in various multinational corporations to shoot for common expiration dates of contracts in an effort to bring economic pressures on the employers.

"There's one other thing," he said. "Where the respective laws and contracts permit, the resolution called for union members in a multinational corporation to refuse overtime in the event any sister union in the world chain is on strike, and to take such other appropriate action that might help reach a settlement."

This, he noted, might include a consumer boycott of the worldwide rubber chain's products for the duration of the dispute.

Bommarito said the Hartke-Burke Bill on multinational corporations and imports now pending before Congress "is a key to getting this program off the launching pad."

"In the Big Five rubber industry, an average of 43 percent of the rubber giants' profits are from overseas operations," he pointed out.

Bommarito said under present U.S. laws the multinationals have found "a home" overseas because they can duck taxes both in the United States and in the foreign countries in which they operate.

In the last 10 months, he noted 13,000 jobs have been lost in the rubber industry in the United States.

"We're not going to stand still for this. Rubber workers don't want welfare—they want jobs," he emphasized. "And I'm talking about rubber workers all over the world. . . .

"The companies have gone multinational. We're following suit by setting up a network of communications to keep abreast."

Clothing Union Asks Action on Import Quotas

Top officials of the Clothing Workers and textile industry representatives urged the federal government to impose mandatory import quotas on men's and boys' apparel for those nations that did not negotiate voluntary agreements by the Oct. 15 deadline.

A delegation—including Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, Sec.-Treas. Howard D. Samuel and Richard Adler, president of the Clothing Manufacturers Association—met with Peter Peterson, special assistant to Pres. Nixon for international economic affairs.

The U.S. government has attempted to work out agreements with Japan, Hong Kong, Taiwan and South Korea, and if agreements were not reached by Oct. 15, the group declared, then mandatory restrictions should be imposed—as promised by Pres. Nixon.

The Doctrine of Inequality

WHEN THE DETAILS of the President's' tax proposals were first unveiled, we saw them as a shocking example of the doctrine of inequality.

In the name of economic stabilization and ending unemployment, the President proposed a radical redistribution of the nation's tax resources in favor of the rich, and at the expense of public interest.

His program would create few jobs, if any; give no healthy stimulus to the economy and make the tax burden of all American families even more inequitable.

In our opinion, he has proposed a giant raid on the Treasury that would transfer billions of dollars of badly needed public funds into the private treasuries of big business. It is geared to the trickle-down economic theory which contends that enriching the already rich is the way to economic progress.

Unfortunately, the bill that passed the House and is now before this committee reflects—with minor exceptions—the proposals of the President. Our original indictment still applies.

The bill guts the corporate tax structure.

From 1972 on, the corporate tax reductions of this bill would result in a permanent cut in the effective tax rate of approximately 15 percent. The annual business tax loss is $2.2 billion in 1971 rising to almost $10 billion by 1980.

OBVIOUSLY, instead of furthering the tax-justice steps that were begun in 1969, this tax bill would establish new loopholes for corporations.

In contrast, an average family of four would receive a tax cut of about 36 cents per week in 1971, slightly over $1 weekly in 1972, and no more cuts thereafter. The reductions for individuals in the bill, with one single exception—the low income allowance—would have been received in any event under the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

The 13.6 million Americans and their families we represent are taxpayers.

They cannot see what sense of priority, what national need, or what concept of fair play can justify putting some $75 billion in public funds over the next 10 years into the hands of corporations and their wealthy stockholders.

They cannot accept the loss or postponement of the badly needed public investments that would be the inevitable result of such a decimation of the federal budget, and they cannot accept the utterly inequitable, business-rigged manner in which the proposed Revenue Act would conduct this raid on the Treasury.

WE ARE HERE to urge the Senate to recognize that this tax bill is rigged overwhelmingly in favor of big business—and against workers, taxpayers and the public interest. And to recognize that public investment and tax justice are precisely what America needs in order to strengthen the economy and provide millions of much-needed jobs.

We hope that the Senate will redress these inequities and reject the myopic and regressive view that what's good for America is only what's good for the wealthy.

A Word Edgewise:

Nixon Overtures to Red China Encourage Peking-Tokyo Axis

By John P. Roche

LAST MAY, in discussing the Ping-Pong demarche, it was suggested here that the major thrust of Peking's new, rational policy was a rapproachement with Japan. The relevant column read in part: "Suppose that Chou En-lai and the Marshals have a Peking-Tokyo Axis in mind? What would be the impact on Japan?"

"First, it would provide a perfect excuse for the Japanese to bow out of their implicit role in the Nixon Doctrine. Second, it would brighten the hearts of Japanese businessmen, dying to move in on the Chinese market. Third, it would demolish the political standing of the pro-American Liberal Democratic Party and with it the political configuration that has governed Japan since the Occupation.

However (I concluded), "the Japanese are a cautious people; they are not going to move rapidly without encouragement from Washington."

That encouragement was forthcoming—in spades. First, the great hullabaloo about the Ping-Pong players, and then—at a stratospheric political and diplomatic level—the Kissinger mission to Peking.

Not only did we give the Japanese the green light, but in the process we first clobbered the status of the Sato government by not informing it of Kissinger's hegira, and then lowered the economic boom without previous consultations. This should go down in the history books as a classic case-study of how not to deal with an ally, particularly an ally that happens to be the only great power in Asia.

In recent weeks, the whole dispute on the role of the Chinese People's Republic has shifted to New York and to the question of the United Nations and the Chinese Nationalists.

Desperate efforts are being made to sustain a "Two Chinas" settlement, the United States is rushing around trying to gather a majority that will demand a two-thirds vote on the expulsion of Taiwan, and in general there is an atmosphere of frenzy. Yet in any long-range assessment, how the United Nations votes on China is trivial in comparison with the development of the Peking-Tokyo Axis—and that is in full swing.

The Chinese Communist press agency, for example, recently published the final communique agreed upon by Peking and a delegation of 19 members of the Japanese Diet. The Japanese were not a bunch of Maoites: six were members of the Liberal Democratic Party (LDP), the traditional supporters of the American alliance. The leader of the delegation was in fact the former LDP Foreign Minister, Fujiyama. In terms of Japanese internal politics, only six members of the party could be considered pro-Peking.

THE SUBSTANCE of the communique is intriguing. The Chinese dropped all references to reparations, which they have long demanded as compensation for the Japanese invasion of China, and made no mention of the treaty between the United States and Japan. All hands agreed that the United States and the Soviet Union should remove their military installations.

Then came the clincher: the visiting Japanese agreed that the ideal arrangement would be an "independent, democratic, peaceful, neutral and prosperous Japan."

Chou En-lai is certainly doing well with his game plan. Mr. Nixon seems to have one of his own, but is he playing on the same field?

Coalition Charges Bias On Home Mortgages

A coalition of labor, civil rights and public interest groups has accused the government's mortgage buying agency of restrictive policies that deny home financing opportunities to millions of families.

The coalition charged that the Federal National Mortgage Association's credit guidelines "flagrantly discriminate" against minority groups, blue-collar workers, the elderly and families with working wives.

Congress authorized FNMA to buy conventional mortgage loans from banks to expand the availability of home financing. But the agency's rigid restrictions on the type of income needed to qualify for mortgages "subverts" the purpose of the legislation, the coalition charged.

Among more than a score of groups calling for a change in policy are the AFL-CIO, NAACP, National Council of Senior Citizens, Auto Workers and League of Women Voters.

Bayard Rustin Says:

Tragedy at Attica Underscores Need to Reform Penal System

THERE ARE TWO Attica tragedies. First, and most important, there are the deaths, the needless sacrifice of the lives of prisoners and guards. And second, there is the gnawing certainty that Attica will repeat itself, again and again, unless the American penal system is drastically reformed and humanized.

We grieve equally for the prisoners, slain in the midst of their final expression of frustration and rage, and for the guards, who were ultimately the unwitting victims of an inhuman system.

At the same time we condemn those who feel that the killing of the inmates was justified, that these men were somehow due less than human consideration. It is the prevalence of this attitude which helped push the prisoners over the brink.

Nor can we condone those who glorify the inhabitants of Attica as revolutionary martyrs or regard the guards as vehicles of repression whose deaths are to be applauded. This is the very rhetoric which will increase friction between prisoners and guards.

The amazing thing is that Attica did not occur earlier. Our prisons are filled with bitter, resentful men who are deprived of their dignity and manhood.

They are filled with poor men and black men, men who are convinced, and often quite rightly, that they would not be where they are if they were not poor or black. And they are filled with men who shouldn't be behind bars in the first place, men who were arrested for gambling and dope addiction which neither harm nor threaten the safety of others.

If the flames which are smoldering inside our prison walls are to be extinguished and future Atticas avoided, we must adopt entirely new thinking about the penal system. We must begin to act on what we have learned from past experience.

We know, for instance, that a great many prisons, far from reforming the convicted criminal, often intensify his grudge against society. Men who are jailed for some petty misdeed leave prison hardened, embittered, and psychologically shattered, and likely to break the law again.

Others, because they are psychologically unbalanced or have been raised in a hostile social environment, are truly menaces to society. They commit crimes of violence—rapes, muggings, murders—and should be incarcerated for the protection of society.

If the ultimate purpose of our system of criminal justice is the reduction of crime and the reform of the criminal, then society and government must begin to distinguish between violent and non-violent offenders and treat them differently.

THOSE WHO BREAK the law but do no harm to their fellow man should not be placed behind a prison wall. For these persons, a prison sentence would do more harm than good, and, considering the conditions within our penal institutions, would indeed represent cruel and unusual punishment.

Those criminals who pose a threat to society should be separated from society, but not in a prison atmosphere. They should rather be placed in hospitals, where there would be tight security, but where a doctor-patient, instead of guard-inmate relationship would exist.

Counseling and job training programs should be made available to those within the prison-hospitals and jobs should be provided when they are deemed ready to re-enter society. The emphasis would be on rehabilitation of the criminal instead of discipline, regimentation and, ultimately, the extinction of the human spirit.

Such a program would undoubtedly cost many tax dollars. But the social benefits would far outweigh the short term financial sacrifice. There would be less crime. Minorities and the poor would gain a measure of confidence in the judicial system. And there would be no more Atticas.

Global Situation Shifts:

Trade Policy Overhaul Urged To Halt Drain on Jobs, Output

A COMPREHENSIVE OVERHAUL of U.S. trade policies is needed to maintain the nation's production base and to curb the severe loss of jobs that now tops a half million, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison declared.

Stressing the rapid changes in world trade stemming from the growth of multinational corporations, managed economies and barriers to U.S. products in many world markets, Denison said America no longer has "a Mom and Pop country" situation with free exchange of exports and imports in world markets.

He said a major problem is "specific tax breaks" given U.S. corporations producing for the U.S. market in such low-wage areas as Taiwan, Hong Kong, Mexico and Haiti, which have encouraged the mounting outflow of U.S. production capital and technology.

Appearing on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Denison said that organized labor strongly backs the recently-introduced Burke-Hartke trade bill, which goes to all aspects of U.S. international trade problems in "a totally different world situation from what we had a decade or two ago—or even five years ago."

Many consumer items that have long been recognized as U.S.-made products are no longer produced in this country, he pointed out.

"Those products are now manufactured abroad," Denison stressed, "either by foreign corporations, or . . . by U.S. corporations operating abroad."

The Burke-Hartke bill also covers dumping and the problem of foreign countries subsidizing their exports. These situations are hard to pin down because of the long investigative periods, Denison noted, but the legislation that organized labor is supporting would shorten the time of the studies.

While past inquiries into dumping and subsidized exports have been time-consuming, he observed, they have not saved U.S. industries nor the jobs of American workers.

"In one industry alone—automobiles—we have now lost 400,000 jobs," Denison said. "In steel, it's approximately 150,000 jobs. In electronics, approximately 80,000 jobs have been lost."

DENISON LISTED other provisions of the bill that would require:

- The federal government to gather far more data on foreign trade than it does now.
- Foreign-made components to carry labels showing in what country they were produced.
- Advertising to specify the country of origin.
- The creation of a new government commission on foreign trade that would take over related programs now in the Treasury, Commerce and Labor departments.

Denison warned that "we may now be beyond the time when we can hope to save" large segments of the U.S. production base, unless there is quick, positive action. He said that textiles, shoes, stainless steel flatware, flint glassware are among the industries "now badly threatened."

He said that even the U.S. "defense establishment" trades heavily overseas, pointing out that our "anti-ballistic missiles are now being assembled in Hong Kong" and vital parts for Polaris submarines and other weapons are manufactured overseas.

"We can go on only so long supporting this kind of program," he declared, for "when our tax base begins to decline, our industrial productivity declines—and our standard of living declines."

Reporters questioning Denison were Ronald L. Soble of Reuters and Alex Uhl of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE OTHER DAY, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson spoke to a conference of manpower specialists.

What he said sounded beautiful.

He noted that in the 1940s the eminent Harvard economist Sumner Slichter listed four ideas that would mark the future course of American history. Slichter proposed:

1. The idea that government must become an instrument of economic policy and intervene in economic matters.
2. There is no single panacea that will solve all our problems.
3. There must be an opportunity for all to find employment.
4. Everyone should have a chance to enjoy the good life.

When Slichter presented those ideas, Hodgson said, "all four could have been sharply questioned." But "today, they all have practically consensus acceptance."

Is this true as far as the Nixon Administration is concerned?

Perhaps the first two are accepted by the Administration. Certainly the wage and price freeze, in fact the entire economic program announced Aug. 15, indicates that the Administration is using economic policy with a heavy hand.

The third and fourth points are open to question. Members of the Administration have openly acknowledged that unemployment has been used as an instrument to combat inflation. This hardly gives everyone the chance for a better life.

This is not an isolated example of the Administration saying one thing and doing something entirely different. Here are a few more choice instances:

Job Safety—The Administration proclaims that it has championed on-the-job health and safety programs. Yet, it fought the strong Williams-Daniels bill in Congress, supporting a far weaker bill.

And now the Administration, in seeking to turn the programs over to the states, admits that many of the more critical aspects of the federal program—such as the right of union representatives to inspect the work sites—will not be required of states.

Job Development—Pres. Nixon, in proposing a 10 percent tax credit for business investment in plants and equipment, has labeled it a "Job Development Credit." To the average citizen it may sound convincing but to many economists it is questionable labeling.

Judging from past experience, though, many plants that are modernized provide fewer jobs than before because they are automated.

Statistical Accuracy—When Commissioner of Labor Statistics Geoffrey Moore assumed his office he issued a statement pledging to maintain the statistical integrity of the BLS.

Now it has been disclosed that he is in the process of removing the key officials in charge of data analysis and replacing them with men who are expected to analyze the statistics in a light more favorable to the Administration.

On top of that, Moore and Hodgson have cancelled briefings of newsmen by the technicians and have offered their own political observations about the reports.

Short Workweek—There is an obvious trend in the country favoring a shorter workweek, perhaps even a four-day week.

The Dept. of Labor now seems to be using this sentiment to support a management effort for a four-day week but based it on a 10-hour day. The gimmick is that the eight-hour day, for which workers fought bitterly, would go down the drain. Workers would work 10 hours a day without overtime after 8 hours.

Sanctity of Profits—The Administration is seeking to convince the public that whereas wages and salaries contribute to inflation, profits—particularly high profits—are medicine the economy needs.

This is based upon the old "trickle down" theory that money in management and business will trickle down to the workers and even the poor. For most economists this idea has been pretty well discarded, recognizing the need of increased purchasing power.

OVERHAUL OF U.S. TRADE policies—including taxes—is a must if this country is to preserve its production base and curb the mounting job loss stemming from the shift of U.S. corporations to overseas operations, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, center, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Alex Uhl, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Ronald L. Soble of Reuters.

House Vote on Federal Employe Pay

The House on Oct. 4 voted 207-174 against a resolution that would have overturned Pres. Nixon's order that the catch-up pay raise government employes were scheduled to receive on Jan. 1 be postponed until next July 1.

On labor's scoreboard, the 148 Republicans and 59 Democrats who voted to deny federal workers their scheduled increase were Wrong (W). The 158 Democrats and 16 Republicans who voted for paying the increase on schedule were Right (R).

Numerals show congressional districts; AL—at large; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

Strike Fund Strengthened:

Allied Industrial Workers Denounce Nixon Programs

St. Louis—Delegates to the 18th convention of the Allied Industrial Workers voted unanimously to reject Pres. Nixon's new economic program and took action to strengthen the union's strike fund.

The more than 540 delegates and alternates representing some 500 locals, heard speaker after speaker criticize the Nixon Administration's programs as unfair and not suited to end the nation's current economic problems.

AIW delegates declared their "firm opposition to the basic programs of the Nixon Administration" in a resolution calling for greater COPE efforts in the 1972 campaign. One amendment called for a COPE report to be on the agenda of every local union meeting.

Another AIW resolution criticized the Nixon economic actions in freezing wages as "inequitable" and said the Nixon tax cuts "will prove to be a bonanza to big business at the expense of workers."

COPE Director Al Barkan drew a roar of approval when he declared: "We can't stand another four years of Richard Nixon."

"We're paying an awful price for losing the last election," Barkan said, citing inflation and unemployment, the growing welfare problem and the highest interest rate levels in 100 years and the Nixon wage-price freeze actions.

Barkan said that in 1968 many unionists "foolishly voted for Wallace and as a result we have Nixon in the White House." A vote for Wallace, he said, is really a vote for Nixon, since "Wallace has about as much chance of being president as Donald Duck."

Civil rights leader Bayard Rustin told the delegates that the economic question is central to the issue of solving the race problems of the nation and noted the failures of Nixon.

"Nobody, not even Herbert Hoover, could create a recession and unemployment at the same time. The man's a genius," Rustin said.

Rustin, who is executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, reiterated his theme that blacks and unionists must unite politically to bring about progress in the nation. He noted that while some unions are failing in their responsibilities to minority group members, labor nonetheless has made it possible for blacks and other minorities to gain higher living standards than would be otherwise possible.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) addressing the delegates on the last afternoon of the convention, called Nixon's economic program a "cosmetic job" that leaves the country in an economic mess. "Everything that should go up, goes down; everything that should go down, goes up," he said.

The AIW's strike fund was bolstered by a temporary per capita tax increase of $1 a month in strike fund contributions until the fund hits $2 million. At that point, the per capita payments to the fund will revert to the present $1 a month.

The action took two roll call votes, the second carrying by a two-thirds margin.

The strike fund, which stood at just under $400,000 on June 30, was seriously in danger of depletion if several of the larger locals were to go on strike, Pres. Gilbert Jewell told the delegates.

In the same action, the convention agreed to increase monthly per capita payments to the international's general fund by 25 cents to pay for expanded services and increased costs due to inflation. Permanent monthly dues will be boosted to a minimum of $5.75 a month—and to a minimum of $6.75 a month during the period in which the special assessment is in effect for the strike fund.

Another amendment calls for secret ballot votes to be taken on actions involving contract acceptance or rejection.

Other resolutions call for stricter pension laws, a curb on multinational corporations, greater tax reform, passage of a National Health Security plan, and higher social security benefits.

ECONOMIC POLICY of the Nixon Administration is described by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) as a "cosmetic job" that leaves the country in a mess. Humphrey addressed the Allied Industrial Workers convention in St. Louis. AIW Pres. Gilbert Jewell is at the right.

4 Rail Shopcraft Unions Win Gains for 90,000

Four shopcraft unions representing 90,000 railroad employes signed 30-month contracts with the nation's rail carriers and, jointly with the employers, asked the Nixon Administration to exempt the benefit improvements from the wage freeze.

The contracts, agreed to after 18 months of delay and dispute, provide wage increases ranging to $1.22 an hour for skilled craftsmen. Other improvements include supplemental sick benefits not to exceed an additional $10.25 a month, eight paid holidays commencing next Jan. 1 and increasing to nine a year later, plus a fifth week of vacation starting Jan. 1, 1973, for workers with 25 or more years of service.

The new pacts follow the pattern set earlier after Congress broke strikes of other railroad unions. They are subject to membership ratification by Nov 9. The unions involved are the Machinists, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Railway Carmen and Boilermakers & Blacksmiths.

Still to be settled are contracts covering 36,000 additional railroad workers—5,500 members of the Sheet Metal Workers, 17,000 in the Firemen & Oilers and 13,000 members of the Railway Signalmen. All are negotiating separately, and all are free to strike since their contracts have expired.

Oct. 1 marked the expiration of a law passed by Congress on May 18 that ended a two-day strike by the Signalmen but ordered the railroads to give union members a first-step pay raise of 12.5 percent for top-paid workers while negotiations continued.

The shopcraft settlement, subject to a pay freeze ruling and a membership vote, provides wage increases of 10 cents an hour retroactive to last Jan. 1, an additional 15 cents an hour for skilled workers and 8 cents for others as of last Apr. 1, 5 percent due Oct. 1, 1971, additional 5 percent increments next Apr. 1 and Oct. 1, and a final 25 cents an hour for the final three-month period beginning Apr. 1, 1973.

A clause improving insurance coverage specifies that the amount of the new $10.25 monthly supplement, plus the existing benefits under the Railway Insurance Act, cannot exceed 70 percent of the straight-time earnings of covered employes.

Another new feature is an increase in insurance coverage to $100,000 for accidental death or major dismemberment and to $50,000 for loss of a foot, eye or hand by accidental means.

Union negotiators were headed by Pres. James E. Yost of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Federal Pay Raise

The Senate on Oct. 7 voted 51-32 against a resolution that would have permitted federal employes to receive a scheduled catch-up pay raise in January, despite Pres. Nixon's move to postpone it until July.

Labor supported the position of the 32 senators who voted for the pay raise resolution.

Equal Rights Proposal Stripped of Protections

The House passed a proposed "women's rights" amendment to the Constitution after rejecting a modification that would have preserved laws designed to protect the health and safety of women workers.

Defeat of the modifying language resulted in withdrawal of AFL-CIO support from the constitutional amendment.

Before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative director Andrew J. Biemiller stressed the federation's position that protective laws for women workers "should be preserved and strengthened, not simply wiped out by a blunderbuss constitutional amendment."

He said state labor laws against exploitation of women workers "are of great importance in low-wage industries such as apparel manufacturing, hotels and restaurants, and retail trade and service in which women workers predominate."

The key vote was the 265-87 rejection of the protective language, which also would have permitted continued exemption of women from the draft. The House then sent the constitutional amendment to the Senate by a 354-23 vote—far more than the required two-thirds majority.

Despite the one-sided House vote, the outlook appeared dim for Senate action this year.

Last year, the Senate took up an identical House-passed constitutional amendment. But it added to it language exempting women from the draft and tacked on also a school prayer amendment. Women's groups that had been pushing the amendment withdrew their support and Congress adjourned without final action.

With a heavy agenda ahead, the Senate leadership is not expected to schedule debate on the amendment in this session.

State-County Adds Tampa Area Unit

Tampa—A cooperative organizing program by 15 unions in the Tampa-St. Petersburg area achieved its first major success when Hillsborough County commissioners voted to recognize State, County & Municipal Employes Local 167 as bargaining agent for 1,200 county employes.

The union is organizing members and distributing voluntary dues deduction cards among hourly paid employes in two county hospitals and the county roads and parks departments. Recognition came under a county labor relations policy calling for appointment of a board to negotiate with a union representing a majority of county employes.

Maryland School Unit Picks Firemen & Oilers

Upper Marlboro, Md.—Plant operations department employes of the Prince Georges County public school system selected Firemen & Oilers Local 400 as their exclusive bargaining agent in an election conducted by the school board.

The vote was 459 for the IBF&O, 424 for the State, County & Municipal Employes, and 23 for no union. There are 1,400 employes in the bargaining unit.

Weekly Earnings Dip:

Jobless Rate Hovers At 6 Percent Level

15 weeks or more decreased slightly from August, but still stood at 1.2 million.

The jobless rates for various groups in the labor force were equally discouraging.

Unemployment for those in the 16-19 age group stood at 17.1 percent, unchanged from August, while joblessness for Negroes and members of other minority races jumped from 9.8 percent to 10.5 percent. The jobless rate for white workers declined slightly from 5.6 to 5.4 percent.

Construction workers showed an unemployment rate of 10 percent and nonfarm service workers had a jobless rate of 11.6 percent.

Unemployed Vietnam-era veterans numbered 320,000 in September—125,000 more than a year earlier—with an unemployment rate of 8.3 percent for veterans in the 20-29 age group. The rate for nonveterans in the same age group was 6.6 percent. The unemployment rate for veterans stood at 6 percent a year ago.

Although the BLS reported that factory jobs increased by 130,000 over the month, they had been at a six-year low, showing a 30,000 loss in August. Nonetheless, September's increase in factory jobs was the biggest in five years, the BLS said.

The average workweek for rank-and-file workers on private nonfarm payrolls dropped more than it usually does in the August-September period to 36.7 hours, the lowest level in a year.

The workweek declined in six of the seven major industry divisions with the largest drop occurring in contract construction—1 hour.

"Bad weather conditions in many sections of the country during the reference week were apparently a contributing factor," the BLS said.

Average hourly earnings also dropped more than could be expected seasonally as many young people left jobs with low hourly rates to return to school. On an adjusted basis, the average hourly wage fell 1 cent to $3.45.

Average weekly earnings fell as the result of these factors, but they were $7.03, or 5.8 percent above those of September 1970, and slightly ahead of the simultaneous increase in consumer prices over the year.

Young people returning to school after being a part of the workforce during the summer were represented in an actual decline of 1.5 million in the civilian work force.

But the decrease was somewhat smaller than usual, and after seasonal adjustment, the civilian work force was up by nearly 300,000 to 84.6 million, a new all-time high.

Employment reached 79.5 million after seasonal adjustment, also a record, but still failed to keep pace with the number of people available for work.

The result was that 5 million people remained unemployed in September, mostly unchanged from the previous month.

In issuing job figures for the third quarter of the year, the BLS noted that the unemployment rate has averaged 6 percent, the same as in the previous three quarters.

The number of jobless remained at 5 million in the third quarter, also the same as the previous three quarters.

But the civilian work force, those working or seeking jobs, increased by 550,000 after showing less growth in the previous two quarters.

Employment stood at an all-time quarterly high of 79.2 million, seasonally adjusted. This was its second straight quarterly increase after a year of decline, the BLS noted.

Payroll employment averaged 70.6 million in the third quarter, little changed from the second. There was a decline of 170,000 jobs in the goods-producing industries.

Factory employment averaged 18.5 million, reflecting a loss of 1.7 million jobs from the all-time high reached in the third quarter of 1969.

Acheson Lauded As Friend of Labor

The ideals for which Dean Acheson fought "will live on long after his death," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a tribute to the former Secretary of State who died Oct. 12 at the age of 78.

Acheson was "a true believer in human freedom and a lifetime friend of the labor movement," Meany said. "Dean Acheson knew America, as the leader of the free world, had a major role to play in achieving freedom for all men everywhere."

As Secretary of State under former Pres. Truman, Acheson played a major role in forging the free world alliance. He left the State Dept. in 1953 to resume a private law practice.

$2 Wage Floor, New Coverage Approved by House Committee

The House Labor Committee has approved a compromise package of amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act that would raise the minimum wage and extend coverage to millions of additional workers, including all public employes and most household domestics.

Under the House bill, the pay floor for most, but not all workers, would rise from the present $1.60 an hour to $2 on Jan. 1, 1972.

Two groups of workers would reach the $2 level a year later, after an intermediate $1.80 step this January. They are the nonfarm workers who were covered by the wage-hour law for the first time when it was last amended in 1966, and the workers who would be newly brought under coverage.

The Nixon Administration had proposed to raise the $1.60 pay floor to $1.80 in January—but to put off a further rise to $2 until January 1974.

The AFL-CIO had urged an immediate increase to at least $2 an hour for all workers, along with universal coverage.

Farm workers now covered by the law—those on the largest farms—currently are limited to a $1.30 wage floor. The House committee bill would boost this to $1.50 on Jan. 1, 1972 and $1.70 a year later, leaving them still 30 cents behind other covered workers.

The AFL-CIO had called for full wage equality for farm workers at the $2 level. But the Administration proposal would have left them even further behind. Under its plan, the farm minimum would rise only to $1.45 when other workers move up to $1.80. And when the general minimum wage rose to $2—in 1974 under the Nixon plan—the farm minimum would be frozen at $1.60 an hour.

In another area, the committee rejected the Administration's plan for a blanket cut-rate wage floor for teenagers and students. But it approved a more limited partial exemption, applying to full-time students.

Under the committee bill, students could be employed in retail trade and other "non-hazardous" industries part-time during the school year and full-time during vacations at either $1.60 an hour or 85 percent of the then-minimum wage, which ever is higher. In agriculture, it would be 85 percent of the farm minimum.

If an employer had up to four students on his payroll, he would have to certify that their employment at below the full minimum wage would not reduce full-time employment opportunities of persons who would have to be paid a higher rate. And if he wanted to hire five or more students, the Secretary of Labor would have to so certify.

Among industries which could not hire students at less than the regular minimum wage would be manufacturing, construction and mining.

The AFL-CIO has strongly opposed lower rates for young people that could result in displacement of heads of families and allow employers to pocket the difference.

The Administration had proposed freezing the minimum wage at $1.60 an hour for all 16 and 17-year-olds, for full-time students under 20, and for out-of-school youth of 18 and 19 during the first six months of their first job.

In coverage, the House committee broke sharply with the Administration's objection to any further extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

It voted to add all public employes—federal, state and local—who are not now covered.

And for the first time, it moved to bring under wage-hour protection a large group of America's lowest-paid workers—maids, cleaning women and other household employes who are covered by the social security law. It excluded only "sleep-in" household employes, an estimated 100,000 as compared with about 1.5 million domestics who would be covered.

Although the bill is a compromise in terms of what labor and other groups supporting minimum wage improvements had sought, it is expected to face a hard fight from the conservative coalition in the House. A number of its provisions were adopted by narrow margins in the House Labor Committee, over Republican attempts to stretch out the pay hike and restrict coverage. Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.) was the original sponsor of the legislation and chairman of the subcommittee that initially acted on it.

A floor battle is also certain over a section of the bill authorizing the President to impose higher tariffs on competitive imports produced under working conditions below U.S. standards, and requiring that foreign concerns selling more than $10,000 worth of goods to the U.S. government pay American prevailing wages to their workers.

Senate Urged to Block Nixon's Tax Giveaway

loss should be made up by "tax reforms that close existing loopholes."

- Labor supports the proposed elimination of excise taxes on automobiles and light trucks as "a long-overdue move toward getting the government out of the sales tax business."
- Instead of writing into law most of the Treasury Dept.'s accelerated depreciation ruling, Congress should completely overturn it. "By halting this giveaway, Congress could recoup $700 million in 1971, and $1.7 billion would be saved in 1972. Over the decade a $27.5 billion business tax bonanza would be avoided."
- If the House-passed business investment tax credit stays in the bill, it will cost the government $1.5 billion in lost revenues this year, $3.6 billion next year and more than $45 billion by 1980.
- Billions more will be lost if the DISC proposal allowing deferral of taxes on export profits is adopted.

Biemiller urged the Senate to adopt instead a retroactive excess profits tax to "remain in effect during any period of freeze, controls or restraints."

And he urged "completion of the unfinished business of tax reform," including full closing of loopholes and "new tax measures to halt the export of U.S. jobs."

The tax reforms proposed by the AFL-CIO could bring in more than $15 billion a year to the federal Treasury, Biemiller stressed.

"America's needs are too critical to be cutting the federal government's income at this time," he testified.

Congress Blocks Retreat In School Lunch Program

Beats Down Cut in Funds, Stiffer Rules

By David L. Perlman

An angry Congress forced the Nixon Administration to abandon its effort to make needy school children pay more for their lunches as an "economy" measure.

So thundering was the congressional disapproval that the school lunch program ended up with increased federal funds, instead of a cutback. And the Agriculture Dept. was forced to rescind an order slashing the number of children eligible for free or reduced-cost lunches.

Shortly before the school year began, the Agriculture Dept. had announced a cut in the federal subsidy for the school lunch program.

There was a flood of protests, and a bill aimed at preventing cuts in federal payments won 75-4 approval in the Senate on Oct. 1.

The Agriculture Dept. then issued new regulations on Oct. 6. They would have provided higher payments for subsidized lunches. But at the same time, they would have struck more than 1 million children from the rolls of those eligible for free or low-cost lunches by imposing the federal poverty standard as the ceiling for eligibility. Previously, states set their own standards for needy students and 40 states had family income levels above the bare poverty level.

A bill to rescind the eligibility cuts won 31-0 approval from the House Education & Labor Committee, and the day it was scheduled for action on the House floor, Oct. 18, the Administration backed down.

Nixon Asks New Power On Controls

By Tom Castor

Pres. Nixon asked Congress to extend legislative authority for his Phase II economic controls, give retroactive ratification of his policies to date, and broaden his powers to include "stand-by" authority over interest rates.

The proposed legislation, which would extend the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970 until April 30, 1973, was sent to Congress Oct. 19, less than four weeks before the 90-day wage-price freeze is scheduled to end.

The Nixon Administration contended that it doesn't need the bill to implement Phase II of the President's economic plans since the stabilization act doesn't expire until April 30, 1972.

But much of what is contained in the pending bill would directly affect the economy during Phase II which Treasury Under Sec. Charles Walker told newsmen will not end until "we break the back of inflation."

The amendments contain language designed to strengthen the act so as to "make crystal clear what Congress intended," Walker said.

And it contains a passage which seeks to secure congressional ratification of "the actions already taken by the President in carrying out his stabilization program."

Specifically, the section is worded to include all "regulations, rules, orders, guidelines, interpretations and circulars heretofore promulgated . . ."

Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), chairman of the House Banking Committee voiced misgivings about this section. He said that in the past the committee "has taken a dim view of retroactive statutes."

"We would need to move carefully on any proposal which might arbitrarily wipe out the legal rights of any individual or group," Patman said.

He nevertheless promised swift committee action on the bill, and Treasury Sec. John B. Connally was scheduled as the first witness.

The legislation contains no formulas to guide the 15-member Pay Board or seven-member Price Commission.

Obsolete Laws Cited:

Federal Standards Pressed for Voters

Millions of Americans are "locked out of the voting booth by voting laws as obsolete as the 12-hour day," the AFL-CIO charged.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed the "hodgepodge" of state laws "unfair and undemocratic" and called on Congress to enact national registration and voting standards. Biemiller's testimony before the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee was given by Legislative Rep. Kenneth Meiklejohn.

The committee, headed by Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.), is considering a number of approaches to a uniform voter registration system for all federal elections.

One bill, by McGee, would establish a postcard registration system administered by the Census Bureau. Postcard registration forms would be sent to each person, preaddressed for mailing to the appropriate voter registration office. The bill would establish a 30-day residence requirement for all federal elections and would provide financial incentives to states to use the same registration system for voting in state and local elections.

Other bills, all designed to simplify voter participation, have been introduced by Senators Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

"The time is at hand to enact legislation that will guarantee that all eligible citizens who wish to vote can do so without impediment," Biemiller urged.

Apathy isn't the only reason 38 percent of Americans of voting age didn't cast ballots in the last presidential election, the AFL-CIO statement noted.

Some 27 million persons were not registered to vote and, of these, an estimated 17 million "were prevented from registering by stone-age residency requirements, by unnecessarily stringent absentee ballot requirements, and by other voting

Curb Sought On Deceptive Sales Tactics

Legislation to crack down on business firms that defraud the public or mislead consumers with worthless product warranties won a strong, enthusiastic endorsement from the AFL-CIO.

Legislative Rep. Kenneth Peterson urged a House Commerce subcommittee to approve a two-part bill aimed at protecting buyers against deceptive practices in the marketplace.

Its first section deals with product warranties, and Peterson cited a long list of abuses that demand correction. These, he said, include "small print exclusions" from warranty coverage, burdensome procedures a buyer must go through to submit a warranty claim, and failure of manufacturers and dealers to make good on promises to

Bookbinders Back Merger With LPIU

Miami Beach—The Bookbinders voted overwhelmingly in favor of merger with the Lithographers & Photoengravers at a special convention here. The vote was 964.5 in favor, 72.5 opposed.

The three-day meeting of 281 delegates from the 79-year-old Bookbinders was a crucial step on the road to merger. There were no speeches, and full time was devoted to examining details of the proposed merger agreement paragraph by paragraph.

Lithographers Pres. Kenneth J. Brown, who appeared here early in the convention, returned to his Washington, D.C., office to handle advance details of the convention his own union will hold, starting Nov. 1 at New Orleans.

The action of both conventions is subject to the referendum votes of the members of both unions. If the members approve merger details, a joint convention of both organizations will meet to fashion a new constitution.

A final referendum vote on approval or disapproval of the constitution will lead to the establishment of a new union, tentatively named the Graphic Arts International Union.

Target date for the actual merger is Labor Day 1972. Involving some 59,000 members of the Bookbinders and 54,000 Lithographers and Photoengravers, the amalgamation would create one of the largest unions in the printing industry.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, who because of other duties was unable to deliver a planned address to the Bookbinders convention, sent a message of congratulations and best wishes for future

Jobless Rate Hits 14% For Negroes in Ghettos

Unemployment hit harder at the nation's urban ghettos during the third quarter of the year with the jobless rate jumping to 10.4 percent overall and to 14.1 percent for blacks, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

In announcing the statistics, the BLS said the series would be suspended after the fourth-quarter report so that data gathered in the 1970 decennial census could be incorporated and reflected in later reports.

BLS officials denied that there is any political motivation behind suspension of the quarterly report and said it would be 1973 before the series could be resumed.

The seasonally adjusted jobless rate of 10.4 percent for the July-September quarter contrasts with a 10.1 percent rate during the same period last year in the poverty areas of the nation's 100 largest cities.

Although the rate for adult women fell from 8.9 to 7.7 percent—its first decline since 1969—the rate for adult men jumped for the second consecutive quarter from 8.3 to 9.4 percent.

House Votes Funds to Aid Alaska Natives

Alaska's original settlers—Eskimos, Aleuts and Indians—stand to share in benefits from 40 million acres of land and a $925 million cash settlement under the Alaska Land Claims Settlement bill passed by the House, 343-63.

The AFL-CIO had endorsed the bill, as had the Alaska Federation of Natives and the State of Alaska. It would eliminate one obstacle to construction of the 789-mile Alaska pipeline. The bill excludes the pipeline area from land claims, but earmarks $500 million for the natives from mineral revenues that otherwise would go to the state in addition to a $425 million direct federal payment.

The money would go into 12 regional native corporations, with a guarantee that a portion would be used by the native villages for development projects and health and education facilities.

Most of Alaska's land is still owned by the federal government. The 1958 statehood law authorized the state to select 103 million acres of this "public domain" land, subject to prior native claims. The state's first selections included most of the oil-rich northern slopes area, but the Interior Dept. froze additional takeovers pending settlement of the native lands claim.

Under the House bill, native villages would have first selection of 18 million acres adjoining their settlements. The state would then complete its selections and the Alaska Native Regional Corporation would then choose 22 million acres from the remaining land.

The House rejected an attempt to add restrictions on land use to the bill.

Avco Strike Produces First Aerospace Pact

Nashville, Tenn.—The first aerospace strike since 1971 negotiations began was settled with major gains for 1,800 members of the Machinists at the Aerostructures Division plant of Avco Corp.

Avco makes wings for two Lockheed Aircraft Corp. jet planes, tail sections for a Lockheed cargo plane and parts for Grumman Corp. planes. It is one of Lockheed's biggest subcontractors.

Meanwhile, the Auto Workers called a walkout of 4,500 members at the Vertol helicopter plant of Douglas Aircraft Division in Malton, Ont. The strike will affect two McDonnell Douglas plants in Santa Monica and Torrance, Calif., where strike votes are scheduled for Oct. 24, the IAM and the UAW reported.

The two unions previously announced that as soon as Phase II of the Nixon wage freeze starts, they will set strike deadlines at plants of Boeing, Douglas, Lockheed and North American Rockwell, where 90,000 workers are waiting for management to "stop stalling and start negotiating" on new contracts.

Delegates at a recent joint meeting of aerospace unions reported that negotiations have been "frozen on dead center" since Aug. 15, when Pres. Nixon halted all wage increases for at least 90 days.

Workers at Avco returned to their jobs this week after a strike that began Aug. 8. The new pact features three wage increases totaling 17 percent over a three-year span; a 10th paid holiday—New Year's Day with double time plus holiday pay for those who must work on those days; vacation pay bonuses ranging from 4.5 percent of annual pay, including overtime, to 8.5 percent after 20 years of service; increases in pension benefits to $6 per month times years of service this year, $6.50 next year and $7 in the final year.

The first raise, averaging 32 cents an hour, was set to take effect Nov. 14, when Phase I of the freeze is due to expire. Additional raises of 4 percent each will be due in August of 1972 and 1973, the normal contract division dates.

The IAM strikers also won a better major medical program, improved life insurance to a top of $6,000 in 1973, and better seniority, safety and grievance provisions.

After this year's wage increases, rates will range from $3.16 to $4.56 an hour.

consummation of merger plans, which have been under negotiation for 16 months.

"This important step is clearly in the best interests of your members, of your craft and of the trade union movement at large," Kirkland wrote

Under the terms approved here, the new Graphic Arts International Union would be headed by Brown, with Sec.-Treas. Wesley A. Taylor of the Bookbinders designated for a similar post with the merged union.

John Connolly, Bookbinders' president, has agreed to serve as executive vice president of the new union. Other officers would be assigned posts under the agreement blending the unions into one by gradual steps over a nine-year period.

The LPIU itself came into existence in 1964 through merger of the Amalgamated Lithographers, founded in 1882, with the Photo Engravers, founded in 1900.

The timetable for the projected merger was set last year after the executive councils of the Bookbinders and the LPIU gave the green light to negotiations on the subject.

In an address to the Bookbinders' convention in 1970, Kirkland assured delegates that "the AFL-CIO is strongly pro-merger."

When the AFL and CIO merged in 1955, he pointed out, the constitution stressed "the responsibility to promote and encourage voluntary mergers between affiliates in similar or related trades and industries."

Kirkland emphasized the importance of mergers for unions faced with "rising costs of operations, the consolidation and merger of corporations, the growth of conglomerates and the onrush of technology."

These factors, he said, "argue very strongly for the consolidation of trade union structures." He added: "It is our conviction that the best interests of the trade union movement at large would be more clearly served by another couple dozen mergers of our affiliates than by almost any other single step that could be taken."

Bermuda Unionists Get Special Course

Front Royal, Va.—A special two-week course in advanced leadership training is being held for 25 Bermuda trade unionists at the American Institute for Free Labor Development training center.

The 20 men and five women head various divisions of the 4,000-member Bermuda Industrial Union.

The training center will conduct a special cram course in collective bargaining and contract administration and sponsor a field trip to Cornell University for a series of seminars.

The Bermuda Industrial Union has grown from 609 members in 1965 to more than 4,000 today and is now going through a "special year" in which it is seeking a dramatic expansion of membership and workers' education.

Job Drain Cited

Hat Workers Seek Curbs on Imports

New York—Delegates to the Hatters convention here looked to Congress and the union label to halt the inroads of low-wage imports that are draining jobs in an already depressed headware industry.

The convention voted a strong endorsement of the labor-backed foreign trade and investment bill introduced in the House by Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.) and in the Senate by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.).

Delegates spoke feelingly of the "sweatshop imports" brought in from low-wage areas of the world, and noted that several American industries which once provided significant numbers of jobs have already been virtually wiped out by imports and the shifting of production overseas.

A convention resolution declared that "it seems doubly cruel to inflict the blight of sweatshop competition on an industry already injured by hatlessness and the vagaries of fashion."

Alex Rose, unanimously re-elected president and secretary-treasurer of the union, told the delegates that consumer loyalty to the union label has been an important means of combatting the surge of low-wage imports.

"The good name of our own organization," Rose said, "and the high repute of the labor movement have helped a good deal in our label activities. We are particularly grateful to the unions and central bodies in various cities for the aid and cooperation they extended in our label activities. This is how it always was in the labor movement," Rose said. "The strong helped the weak, the big and powerful unions helped the small and frail ones."

Rose, a longtime leader of New York's Liberal Party, stressed the importance of political action and noted that conservative forces that have come to power "have solved none of the old problems that beset the nation but have created plenty of new ones."

A convention resolution called for a mobilization of labor and liberal forces to oust the Nixon Administration.

The triennial convention was the 14th since the merger of formerly competing organizations, but the union traces its origins back to the early 19th Century.

Its many women delegates added a colorful touch to the convention gathering with their union-label millinery. And a resolution on equal pay for women and men was adopted unanimously, but with a notation that its goal is already a fact in the union's contracts and wage scales.

Negro Ghetto Unemployment Jumps to 14%

The rate for teenagers remained unchanged at 26 percent.

While the overall rate for Negroes jumped to 14.1 percent, the rate for whites declined from 9.1 percent to 8 percent.

A large part of the rise in unemployment for adult men reflected a sharp increase in joblessness for black adult men. The rate for this group jumped from 9.8 percent to 12.1 percent in the third quarter.

The rate for white adult women dropped from 8.3 percent to 5 percent, but the rate for black adult women jumped from 10 to 11.4 percent.

The bureau said that both the population and the labor force in urban poverty areas were unchanged. Employment in these neighborhoods declined by 110,000 on a seasonally adjusted basis to 5.6 million, while unemployment rose by a like amount to 632,000.

Vietnam Veterans Find Job Prospects Bleak

Returning Vietnam-era veterans are finding it more and more difficult to find jobs, especially if they are young and unskilled or black.

The unemployment rate for veterans in the 20-29 age group stood at 8.3 percent in the third quarter of 1971, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, as against 6 percent a year ago.

The situation was much worse for the younger veteran in the 20-24 age group who was probably entering the labor force for the first time. The unemployment rate for this age group stood at 11.2 percent, almost twice the rate for veterans 25-29.

The jobless rate for Negro veterans skyrocketed to 14 percent, in contrast to a rate of 7.7 percent for whites.

About 320,000 Vietnam-era veterans were jobless in the third quarter, not much of a change from the second three-month period of the year, but 110,000 more than a year ago.

Although employment among veterans rose 435,000 over the year to reach an average of 3.5 million, the increase was not large enough to offset the rise in the labor force. There are now about 3.8 million 20-29-year-old veterans in the civilian labor force, the BLS reported.

The unemployment rate for nonveterans in the same age group was 6.9 percent, and joblessness among the entire civilian labor force has hovered around 6 percent for the past year.

As compared with a year ago, the BLS said, there was a sharper increase in the jobless rate for veterans than for nonveterans the same age, but the number of veterans in the labor force also increased faster than the number of nonveterans.

The BLS noted that none of the data on veterans is seasonally adjusted because statistics have not been recorded long enough to adjust for periodic fluctuation.

Nixon Asks Power To Extend Controls

It asks Congress that the President be given authority to "stabilize prices, rents, wages, and salaries at levels not less than those prevailing on May 25, 1970; and to stabilize interest and corporate dividends and similar transfers at levels consonant with orderly economic growth."

Walker told reporters that he doubted whether the President would use the provision for controlling interest rates, even if passed, because the Administration is "reasonably confident" that the new economic game plan "by severely puncturing inflation, will actually cause interest rates to decline."

The bill would add a $2,500 civil penalty for violation of stabilization rules. Although present law provides a criminal penalty of $5,000 for violation of the wage-price freeze, government lawyers say that civil court actions generally are easier to win than criminal cases.

The bill would also give the chairmen of the Pay Board, Price Commission and the Cost of Living Council authority to issue subpoenas in connection with any investigation or proceeding connected with the stabilization program.

The same section provides that information received by an agency will be protected by criminal laws prohibiting unauthorized disclosure of such information.

The proposed law also gives the Attorney General responsibility for bringing injunctive proceedings on behalf of the wage-price agencies, and says additionally that the court issuing an injunction may also order restitution.

As for judicial review of pay-price decisions, the bill spells out original jurisdiction for U.S. District Courts and creates a Temporary Emergency Court of Appeals.

The temporary court, the Administration said, would serve two functions:

- Act as a normal court of appeals in handling judicial review of wage-price cases from federal district courts.
- Have exclusive jurisdiction to rule on the constitutional validity of the act "or any regulation or order of Phase II agencies."

"These judicial review provisions would apply to actions pending on the date of enactment," said an Administration analysis of the law.

The legislation would have federal conflict-of-interest laws waived for all members of the Pay Board and Price Commission except their chairmen.

Grain Millers Strike Closes 7 Sugar Plants

Minneapolis—Substandard wages and working conditions at seven plants of the American Crystal Sugar Co. were blamed by the the Grain Millers for walkouts of about 2,000 employes in four states.

Operations were halted or reduced, for the first time in nearly 10 years, at sugar plants in Chaska, Crookston, East Grand Forks and Moorhead, Minn., Mason City, Ia., Drayton, N.D. and Rocky Ford, Colo.

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service called both sides to a meeting here Oct. 20. Old contracts expired Aug. 1 and talks on a new three-year agreement reached an impasse in mid-October.

Grain Millers Pres. Roy O. Wellborn, who heads union negotiators, said management gave the union a take-it-or-leave it offer a week ago. Main unsettled issues involve base pay for seasonal workers, severance pay for workers at closed plants, and shift differentials.

"The strike will continue until they give the people a sensible offer," Wellborn said. "The company has taken advantage of workers and beet farmers for too many years. This is the year to straighten out."

Management announced it will not accept sugar beets from growers until the strike is settled.

The striking locals formerly were affiliated with the Sugar Workers, which merged with the Millers. Not on strike is a company plant at Clarksburg, Calif., represented by the Distillery Workers, Wellborn reported.

Uniform Federal Law Pressed for Elections

laws designed to inhibit rather than encourage use of the franchise."

The disenfranchised, Biemiller noted, include many union members.

The AFL-CIO testimony strongly urged that residence requirements be lowered and made uniform for state and local, as well as federal elections.

Existing federal law sets a 30-day residence requirement for presidential elections, requires that applications for absentee ballots for voting for President be accepted up to seven days before the election, and allows ballots to be turned in up to the time the polls close.

The same provisions should be extended by law to congressional elections, Biemiller said, and states should be given incentives to adopt them for non-federal elections.

His testimony also referred approvingly to the Texas registration procedure that allows one member of the family to enroll other family members instead of requiring every new voter to register in person.

The overriding case for a national voter registration law with minimum requirements, Biemiller noted, is the experience in the various states and communities.

"Where laws encourage voter participation, make registration easy and permit registration close to election day, registration and voter participation are increased substantially.

"Where laws inhibit voter participation, make registration inconvenient, and shut off registration long before election day—as many do—registration and voter participation tend to be low."

High Court Rebuffs J. P. Stevens, NLRB Bargaining Order Stands

The Supreme Court denied a petition by J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., the nation's leading defier of employe organizing rights, for review of an Appeals Court decision ordering the big government textile supplier to bargain with a union.

The dismissal let stand a historic National Labor Relations Board decision, later enforced by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans. The decision, handed down two years ago, compels Stevens to negotiate with the Textile Workers Union of America for 400 workers in the giant firm's Gulistan carpet plant at Statesboro, Ga.

Stevens previously had been guilty of violating federal labor law in 12 other cases, but has stalled off its duty to bargain by appealing every ruling to the courts.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said the action by the Supreme Court clears the way for enforcement of the NLRB order to bargain. He called it a major victory in the union's eight-year drive to help Stevens workers win union contract conditions.

The Supreme Court started its new term with a series of rulings in labor-related cases that included a refusal to hear arguments on a ruling upholding the right of two construction workers fired for honoring a production workers' picket line.

The high court let stand a decision that the Union Carbide Corp. had no right to fire two nonstrikers in a 1967 strike by the Machinists at a chemical plant in S. Charleston, W. Va. The two men had refused to cross the strikers' line as a matter of principle. The company was upheld, however, on the firing of a third worker, who said he was "afraid" to cross the line. The lower court had ruled that he was not engaged in protected activity under the labor law. The justices also refused to review the latter case.

In a 6-1 vote, the justices refused to hear an appeal by the Postal Clerks from a lower court decision upholding the constitutionality of a law denying federal employes the right to strike. The Clerks claimed the government should have to prove that a worker is essential before he can be forbidden to strike. Justice William O. Douglas held the union should have been given a hearing.

Most states have similar laws governing their employes, and one of these laws figured in a related court decision. The high court by a 5-2 vote affirmed a decision upholding a 1967 anti-strike law in New York. The State, County & Municipal Employes challenged the law as an infringement of the right of free speech. Justices Thurgood Marshall and Potter Stewart objected as the other justices upheld without a hearing a decision against the union by the 2nd U.S. Court of Appeals in New York City.

Review was refused by the Supreme Court of a lower court's approval of the Philadelphia Plan, the Nixon Administration's program of distributing jobs on federal construction programs. The plan requires unions and contractors to hire a stated quota of Negroes and other minority group workers on any job financed by federal funds.

The Contractors Association of Eastern Pennsylvania had sued on the ground a presidential order was an unconstitutional use of power. Two lower courts had rejected the claim.

The court agreed to review a St. Louis appeals court ruling that the Taft-Hartley Act does not protect workers against reprisal by their employer for giving sworn statements to an NLRB field examiner. The case involves Robert Scrivener, who as head of the A A Electric Co. fired three employes for giving sworn statements to the examiner. The NLRB asked for review and reversal. It said protection for employes is "crucial" in such cases.

In another labor case, the court agreed to decide a dispute over successorship. The NLRB said a 2nd Circuit Appeals Court ruling conflicts with another appeals court decision. The case involves the Burns Detective Agency, low bidder on a contract at Lockheed Aircraft Service Co., Ontario, Calif. Burns refused to recognize a contract made by the United Plant Guards with a predecessor contractor, and appealed an NLRB order to bargain with UPG.

$2 Minimum Wage Bill Termed 'Good Beginning'

The minimum wage bill approved by the House Labor Committee is "a good beginning" and "long overdue," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

It would raise the federal wage floor for most workers to $2 on Jan. 1, 1972, and add to the Fair Labor Standards Act coverage millions of domestic workers and public employes.

"While this bill does not satisfy all of the goals of the AFL-CIO," Meany noted, "it is urgently needed to protect those workers at the bottom of the wage scale, who have been falling further and further behind."

Its chief beneficiaries are "those workers who have suffered most from inflation," he stressed.

Meany called for "priority attention" to the legislation, urged the House leadership to schedule it for early action and asked all congressmen to vote for it.

"Millions of American families deserve no less than this," Meany said.

National Voting Standards

THE PRESENT HODGE-PODGE of registration and voting laws is both unfair and undemocratic. Unfair because too often they have been written to circumscribe rather than expand the voting opportunities of American citizens. Undemocratic because the few areas where voting laws actually encourage voter participation mock the many where they don't and, in effect, render citizens in these regions a disadvantaged electorate.

Some figures shed light on the problem of voting in America and suggest that there is indeed far more than apathy limiting participation of our citizens in the electoral process.

In 1968, 116 million Americans were over 21 years of age and eligible to vote in the presidential election. Thirty-eight percent of these—44 million citizens—did not vote. Of these, 27 million were not even registered. Election experts estimate some 10 million of the unregistered could have registered but simply didn't.

The shocking figure is that there were 17 million who would have registered but were prevented from registering by stone-age residency requirements, by unnecessarily stringent absentee ballot requirements, and by other voting laws designed to inhibit rather than encourage use of the franchise. Many are members of our unions.

IN RECENT YEARS, there has been some progress toward more rational and more equitable election laws. The Voting Rights Act of 1965, extended for five more years in 1970, has brought a dramatic increase in voting participation by black and other minority group Americans, and it has eased residency requirements for voting in Presidential elections.

Extension of the franchise to 18-year-olds by reason of adoption of the 26th Amendment clearly will add large numbers to the voting rolls. Some states have also made sincere, if belated, efforts to clear away some of the barriers that have stood between citizens and the voting booth for years.

But still, the books of many states and localities teem with laws that stifle voter participation. It is time to wipe the books clean and to cease playing around piece-meal with our election laws. It is time to enact national registration and voting standards.

WE BELIEVE the Congress is confronted with an historic opportunity. There has never been a truly serious national effort to establish standards that make registration and voting easy in all elections. That effort must be made now.

The AFL-CIO believes that in our democracy all citizens should take part in selection of the public officials who make decisions that affect their lives. This process of selection is performed in the voting booth. Citizens of every state should have equal and easy access to the voting booth.

We believe it is the right to vote that most distinguishes democracy from dictatorship, and that whatever limits it, blurs this most important distinction.

We think the citizens of this nation want and must have easy access to voting and that the time is at hand to enact legislation that will guarantee that all eligible citizens who wish to vote can do so without impediment.

A Word Edgewise:

'Double-Think' Marks Debate Over UN Two-Chinas Policy

By John P. Roche

SOME RECENT OBSERVATIONS here on the absurd double-think involved in applying sanctions to the white supremacist Smith regime in Rhodesia while shipping truck factories to the Soviets brought a good deal of flak from irate readers.

For some inexplicable reason, my views were taken as an apologia for the whites in Rhodesia and Africa, though the whole point of the column was that in foreign affairs moral standards should be applied across the board—that you can't have your favorite dictatorships.

Let us explore this in a different context: membership in the United Nations. If in 1945 we had made the decision that only democratic states should participate in the UN, membership since would have remained fairly stable, reaching the neighborhood of 40.

It would have been cozy: the three Russias (which by the way are an interesting precedent for "Two Chinas"), their Communist satellites, the various military juntas, and the relics of fascism would not have been around to stir the waters, justify the bureaucracy at Turtle Bay, and raise rents on Sutton Place. However, this was patently preposterous and—with initial restrictions on World War II enemies and their accomplices—the UN was dedicated to universalism.

Fair enough. However you defined your categories, the just and the unjust agreed to sit down together and try to work out their problems and prevent war. Then came the Communist victory in mainland China and the flight of the Nationalist government to Formosa. By 1953 it was clear that for the foreseeable future there were in fact two Chinas, although each denied the imperatives of geography. Indeed, the United States was reportedly within weeks of recognizing Peking when the Korean War began.

Once the Korean War was over and United Nations forces were no longer fighting the Peoples' Liberation Army, those of us who believed in universalism argued for admission of Peking to the UN—and, on a separate track, for U.S. recognition of Mao's regime. Americans for Democratic Action, for example, took this position.

Without engaging in any retroactive self-pity—a boring exercise if ever there was one—it is fair to say that our viewpoint was not well and warmly received. Democratic politicians fled from us as from the plague, Vice Pres. Richard Nixon gave us the leather, and one leading Pennsylvania Democrat will be convinced to his dying day that his association with ADA's "Two Chinas" policy cost him the governorship. I almost got lynched in Chicago.

AS LATE AS 1964, when, as National Chairman of ADA, I appeared on Face the Nation, one of the panelists threw a wicked Chinese hook, accusing us of appeasing communism. My reply followed our principled position in favor of universal membership. Indeed, I personally had supported the Soviet proposal at the UN that both Germanys, both Koreas, and both Vietnams be admitted to the world body.

John Foster Dulles unwisely blocked this sensible notion, which would have had as its accidental by-product the elimination of the later charge that the North Vietnamese invasion of the South was a "civil war."

Now, suddenly, the atmosphere has changed. All right-thinking people are supposed to favor the admission of Peking. Even the Congress, for the first time in 20 years, failed to resolve against that.

In addition, there is tremendous pressure in the liberal movement for the expulsion of Taiwan, a viable country of 14 million people. This would be an outragous repudiation of the principle of universalism, one that would justify a statement from the current chairman of ADA calling for U.S. withdrawal from the United Nations. I shall listen for his trumpet.

ILGWU Steps In:

Health Hazards of Sweatshops Afflict Today's Farm Workers

By Leon Stein

The following appeared in the Oct. 1, 1971 issue of Justice, publication of the Ladies' Garment Workers. Stein is the paper's editor.

DELANO, CALIF.—We have come 30 miles up on Route 99 out of Bakersfield through the flat farm country to Delano, where it was 102 degrees. We had come to see the new health clinic being built at the "Forty Acres" headquarters of the AFL-CIO Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

Our guides—one of the clinic's young doctors and an administrative staff member—were waiting for us at the unfinished building. It stood in a vast, bald area cleared out of the surrounding greenery. It was a long, one-story structure, a shaded porch running its full length, its roof lined with Spanish tiles.

"Six years ago we had only a shack in this place for a headquarters," the young doctor noted. We decided to look in at the new headquarters, some 100 yards from the clinic. I hesitated to ask about the mobile health unit.

But as we came around the rear of the headquarters building, there it was, the letters blazoned on it loud and clear. It is a long van and on its sides it proclaims, "International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union Mobile Health Center."

This ILGWU Mobile Health Center had made the circuit of garment union frontiers for more than a decade. In 1955, when it had just been put into service, I rode with it and its crew through the flooded areas of Pennsylvania after the governor of the state had called on the Northeast Dept. to enlist the unit in the fight against the threat of typhus.

Then the ILGWU mobile clinic had gone pushing up along the dirt roads into the remote areas of the southeast. Through the years it had pulled up at hundreds of garment plant gates and waited for the workers to come filing through its compact examination rooms, its X-ray lab, while its dedicated staff probed and searched for the deadly germ. Scores of lives had been saved. For many, the mobile unit had provided a first medical examination since childhood.

It stands now, an intricate jumble of equipment, generating its own electric power, its X-ray still probing. Only now it penetrates the chests of farm workers instead of garment workers. We stood in silent admiration. What does one say to an old friend still carrying on?

The young doctor said it first. "Here is this miracle of the ILGWU emblem hundreds of miles away from the garment shops set down in the middle of this hot farmland. Every day a small army of Spanish-speaking farm workers and their families mount its steps. They come out of this van with a better chance for good health than they had going in."

I think the four of us had simultaneously been struck by this thought. The ILGWU emblem in the hot Delano sun was as unlikely as an artichoke blossoming in the middle of Seventh Avenue.

Yet, there is was because four years ago, as UFWOC fought toward its initial victories, the desperate need for health care became clear. The ILGWU then moved this unit out of its fleet of Mobile Health Centers which supplements its big-city centers and dispatched it to the California farm workers' picket lines. Ultimately, it came to rest in Delano.

"That was the start of our clinic," the young doctor pointed out.

As we walked back to our car, I asked him what ailments had emerged as predominant among the farm workers.

There could be no question about it, he said. They were those centering on the lungs and the back. The worst, he said, was tuberculosis.

"My God! My God!" I was crying within me as the young medic, the cause blazing from his eyes, kept talking.

"It's in the dust. There is something in the dust out here. In the long hours in the fields they breathe in the dust. Along with it they breathe in the disease. Tuberculosis is a major challenge."

SUDDENLY, HALF A CENTURY fell away and I was hearing again the voice of Dr. George Price, who had helped to establish the first ILGWU Health Center in New York after the historic cloakmakers' strike. I remember hearing him—an aged patriarch—telling the delegates to an early New Deal convention of the ILGWU of the first battles of the union against the dread disease.

He had talked about an ocean of polluted air that filled the garment shops in the first years of the century. He, too, had talked about workers breathing in disease and dust.

Dr. Price had described the garment workers' long hours bent over the machine. I stood listening to the young doctor talk about the farm workers' long hours bent backwards as they picked the fruit and the vegetables. "Things begin to bend and break inside from the distortion and the pressures," he was saying.

That was the only difference: how they bend, how they break.

The ILGWU has contributed $12,000 from the David Dubinsky Foundation for equipping the UFWOC Health Clinic. It has donated its mobile unit, equipment and all.

Says ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg: "The enemy is the sweatshop even if it is in a sun-drenched field. The prize is workers' lives. And only time separates the 1910 East Side garment sweatshop from the 1970 California farm sweatshop."

Updating Overdue:

Safety Law Points to Gains In Workmen's Compensation

THE NEW OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY law will help pave the way for long-overdue updating of the workmen's compensation system, an AFL-CIO social insurance expert predicted.

James O'Brien, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security, pointed out that the job safety act provides for a National Commission on State Workmen's Compensation Laws.

The functions of the commission will be to study and evaluate state laws to determine if they "provide an adequate, prompt and equitable system of compensation for injury or death" related to on-the-job accidents or health hazards, the law states.

O'Brien also noted that as the new on-the-job health and safety regulations take hold, employers as well as workers will become "more conscious of safety in the plant." And, he stressed, as the incidence of job-related sickness, injury and death declines, lower rates for workmen's compensation insurance should follow.

But the key to bringing workmen's compensation up to realistic current needs is "minimum federal standards" for both the amount and duration of benefits for disabled workers and the survivors of workers killed in job-related accidents, he declared.

O'Brien noted that workmen's compensation was originally intended to replace two thirds of a worker's normal wage during his recovery period, but "only one or two states" now meet that test. He added that in many instances, benefits under the law are so inadequate that disabled workers are forced to seek welfare and other forms of public assistance.

Questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview Labor News Conference, O'Brien said that state-administered workmen's compensation laws also leave large gaps in coverage, with workers in "some of the most hazardous industries" unprotected.

O'Brien said that stiff opposition of employer groups and insurance industry spokesmen is a major obstacle to improvement of workmen's compensation in state legislatures, but there are hopeful signs of increasing congressional interest in a greater federal role in the system.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

VERY FEW PRESIDENTS of the United States have been as prone as Pres. Nixon to protest vigorously that they would never, never follow a certain course only to turn around when it suited their purpose to do just that.

The President said that he would never "jawbone" in an effort to influence wages and prices. He went beyond "jawboning" when he set up the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee which passes on the "inflationary" impact of construction wage increases.

The President continued to insist that he would never call for government interference in labor-management negotiations. But the August wage-price "freeze" not only froze wage increases for 90 days, but actually cancelled non-economic gains in contracts already negotiated and due to go into effect during the 90-day period.

Now the President has invoked Taft-Hartley sanctions in the West Coast Longshoremen's strike, in spite of his often repeated assurances that he would not use the 80-day strike injunction clause of the act. His action ignored the advice of one of the top men in his Administration that "national emergency" proclamations have been gravely abused and the 80-day injunction has been largely futile.

In January 1970, a special report on the impact of three separate Longshoremen's strikes on the national economy was made to George P. Shultz, now Nixon's top economic adviser, but then his Secretary of Labor. The three strikes were in Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports. The current ones involve West Coast and Eastern ports as well. Yet, essentially the same principles of what constitutes a "national emergency" are involved.

The Shultz report of 1970 concluded that "national emergency" strikes that represented a major threat to health and safety were largely a fiction.

Declaring that the line between "economic" and "health and safety" is ambiguous, the report found that:

"The strikes had no visible impact on the economy as a whole—industrial production, retail sales, national income or total employment."

It further quoted from a similar study made by the Dept. of Labor after the steel strike of 1961, saying:

"It is our opinion that the economic impact of strikes on the economy is usually seriously exaggerated."

The conclusion of the steel study was that usually a settlement would be reached once strikes "really begin to be seriously felt over wide segments of the economy."

THE LONGSHOREMEN'S strike study of 1970 is 79 pages long and contains as many pages of appendices and references to newspaper articles generally depicting the "adverse" effects of the strikes on the economy.

The report says that the 80-day "cooling-off" period resulting from the 80-day Taft-Hartley injunctions "may have contributed to the reduction of the strikes' impact," but immediately adds that it is reasonable to expect that similar behavior might have resulted if it had been made clear that there would be no recourse to the Taft-Hartley injunction clause.

Commenting on the report at that time, Shultz said that as far as he was concerned the report meant that great caution should be exercised before strikes are labeled "emergency" ones. This was then in line with the philosophy of the Administration to adopt a "hands off" attitude in strikes.

All during his Administration, the President has insisted on his determination to depend on free collective bargaining and a free economy to answer the needs of the nation's economy. That apparently is now all over. Few Presidents have ever interfered so completely with the free play of the economy, especially as it affects the American workers.

LONG-OVERDUE UPDATE of the workmen's compensation system will get a boost from implementation of the new Occupational Safety & Health Act, James O'Brien, center, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, predicted on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Murray Seeger, left, of the Los Angeles Times, and Donald Finley of United Press International. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

Illinois Labor Lashes Governor on Vetoes

Springfield, Ill.—The anti-labor policies of Republican Gov. Richard B. Ogilvie and the pro-business policies of Pres. Nixon came under sharp attack at the Illinois AFL-CIO convention here.

The 2,400 delegates, representing some 1.2 million union members, lashed out at the governor's veto of key labor bills passed by the legislature. And they broke precedent by endorsing a candidate to succeed him, even before party primaries.

The convention choice was Paul Simon, the state's Democratic lieutenant governor, who told the delegates that he would sign and not veto such measures as a ban on importation of strikebreakers and comprehensive workmen's compensation improvements.

On the national front, delegates associated themselves with the criticism of the Nixon economic program by the AFL-CIO and Federation Pres. George Meany.

The convention approved a doubling of the per capita tax from 12 to 24 cents each three-month quarter.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Stanley L. Johnson, Sec.-Treas. Robert G. Gibson and all incumbent vice presidents were declared reelected without opposition. Delegates approved a 4 percent pay boost for both Johnson and Gibson.

The convention voted to support a suit brought by the Steelworkers to upset the new congressional map for Illinois approved by a federal court. Steelworkers District Director Joseph Germano, a vice president of the state federation, termed the redistricting plan "blatantly gerrymandered." It would protect all 12 incumbent Republican congressmen and eliminate two Democratic districts.

Delegates voted a strong endorsement for the Kennedy-Griffiths National Health Security bill.

They also urged more funds for vocational education, urged improved coverage of labor in school textbooks, and called on the legislature to provide funds to prevent the closing of Chicago schools 12 days early in December. The school system said it doesn't have the money to complete the scheduled school term.

Other resolutions called for a trade policy to halt the loss of American jobs, urged a register-and-vote campaign keyed to young voters, called for legislation to give federal employes greater rights, asked an end to the Vietnam war, and backed food stamps for strikers.

Three senators were among the convention speakers.

Sen. Adlai E. Stevenson (D-Ill.) lashed at Nixon's economic policies as favoring business "at the expense of workers and individual taxpayers." He also called for new labor relations legislation in the transportation industry.

Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.) urged labor-management productivity councils at the plant level. He told the delegates he wants "to work with labor to make sure that if we have a wage-price freeze, we don't have interest rates going up and excess profits while your wages are frozen."

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) told the convention that Pres. Nixon's economic program has ignored a basic requirement for prosperity—jobs.

The nation will need 25 million new jobs in the next five years, Humphrey said, and "I don't see us getting them from the Nixon Administration."

Textile Import Pact Viewed as Step Forward

The Nixon Administration's agreement with Japan, Taiwan, South Korea and Hong Kong to limit imports of synthetic and wool products into the United States is viewed as a step in the right direction by four textile apparel unions.

But the four unions are reserving further comment until a full study of the agreement is made to determine what impact it will have on the jobs of their members.

The unions are the Textile Workers Union of America, Clothing Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers and the United Textile Workers of America.

While the agreement places a three-year limit on exports to the United States, it lifts the 10 percent surcharge on the foreign-made textile products.

Japanese exports would be allowed to increase 5 percent over the next three years. But the exports of South Korea, Taiwan and Hong Kong will be allowed to jump 7.5 percent.

Pilot Plant Proves Value:

Recycling Converts Refuse Into Rich Materials Source

There may not be gold in those unsightly hills of refuse at a smelly municipal dump, but there could well be reuseable glass, aluminum, brass, copper, steel and zinc.

As a matter of fact, it can even be profitable to extract these elements from refuse, according to Pat Fagan of the Steelworkers public relations staff, writing in the October issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO monthly magazine.

He cites an experimental project by the U.S. Bureau of Mines at the University of Maryland aimed at processing incinerator residue.

It takes refuse at one end and produces commercially valuable products at the other end—at a profit—for the simple reason that refuse is rich in all the materials thrown into it.

"Indeed, for some of these materials, refuse is a resource richer than the ore that is profitably mined and refined under the standard procedures," the article says.

The recycling itself requires no specially designed machinery and uses conventional and proven techniques of mineral processing.

"The three basic operations of recycling consist of shredding and grinding incinerator residue into small particles, separating out different materials with magnets and screens of different sizes and washing to remove dust particles.

"The resulting products are glass particles, aluminum, brass, copper, steel and zinc. The cost of this operation for a city of 250,000 people is $3.52 a ton—including the cost of labor, equipment and building.

"The end product is worth $12 a ton," the author emphasizes.

A larger recycling plant would cost about $2.2 million to build, according to the Bureau of Mines, and Fagan notes that the plant on which those figures are based is not hypothetical—it actually exists and is functioning in Edmonston, Md.

Other methods of reclaiming refuse now under development include:

- An air classification system which sorts waste by pressurized air combined with screening and magnetic segregation.
- Shredding, classification and pelletizing of solid waste with the added feature of finally incinerating the residue in water-lined walls that would produce steam for municipal power.

"The full cooperation of the federal government is necessary if any of these experiments are to prove successful," Fagan writes.

Legislation before Congress would fund up to 75 percent of the cost of municipal waste recovery systems, the article notes.

These are only a few of the alternatives proposed by the Steelworkers, among others, as they have called for a comprehensive approach to the problem of solid wastes as opposed to concentrating on one small part of the problem—disposal.

Fagan writes that the emotionally charged issues of ecology, litter and disposal have resulted in the public "ignoring the long-range value of recovery and conversion, the cornerstone on which any permanent solution must be built"

Although he notes that litter is a national disgrace, he also emphasizes that legal penalties, such as littering and dumping fines of up to $500 have been ineffective.

So has the banning of nonreturnable cans and bottles, a drastic action that would take away thousands of jobs.

"Vermont learned that the elimination of non-returnable bottles and cans will not solve the nation's solid waste disposal problem. The state of Vermont, after repealing its ban on one-way containers, reported to the Bureau of Solid Waste Management that the prohibition did not measurably reduce even the cost of collecting litter, the smallest component of expense in waste treatment."

Dockworkers Stress Solidarity in Walkout

Mobile, Ala.—The AFL-CIO Longshoremen took steps here to strengthen their three-week-old strike against East and Gulf Coast dock employers as a means of bringing them back to the bargaining table.

No meetings with management have been held since more than 45,000 ILA members walked out Oct. 1 to prevent cutbacks in contract conditions. Pres. Nixon announced he was appointing mediators to bring the parties together again, but no mediators have appeared, ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason said.

Gleason met here with leaders of Gulf and South Atlantic local unions and announced later that all agreed to support the ILA position on joint action.

Members of about 50 local unions in Texas ports stayed at work while all other ILA locals went on strike. The 50 have now agreed to convene local meetings over the weekend for a vote on joining the walkout.

Gleason's position was, and still is, that a strike during the Nixon wage freeze would be pointless unless employers try to weaken work guarantees. They did so in New York and other ports, and therefore a walkout is necessary to preserve union solidarity, the conferees agreed.

Gleason announced receipt of a message from the Masters, Mates & Pilots pledging all-out support of the dockers' strike. No members of the union will sail dry cargo ships or grain-carrying tankers unless they carry military cargoes, MM&P Pres. Thomas F. O'Callaghan wired. The latter's union voted recently to merge with ILA.

Only one breach remained in the ILA's ranks. Philadelphia employers won a Common Pleas Court order for 160 dockmen to end their strike and return to work. Still out as some members of five ILA locals obeyed the injunction were cargo clerks and checkers in two other locals, who were reported not available for work.

On the West Coast, members of the Longshoremen & Warehousemen were returning to work in response to an 80-day court injunction granted at the request of the Nixon Administration. ILWU members were in the fourth month of a strike for contract betterment when the President invoked emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Federal mediators reported ratification of a three-year contract between Machinists at Los Angeles-Long Beach and stevedore employers. A spokesman said the agreement calls for wage increases of 65 cents in the first year, and an additional 50 cents in each of the two following years. The IAM members had been out on strike but also were ordered to return for 80 days.

Job Safety Institutes Set At 10 Key Universities

A series of institutes aimed at gaining effective implementation of the new Occupational Safety & Health Act will be conducted at 10 universities across the country.

The program was developed by the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, the Industrial Union Dept. and the federation's Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health.

It is an outgrowth of a pilot session held at the studies center last month. Participants in the project were government experts on the new law, union health and safety specialists, and faculty members of the participating universities.

The 10 universities are Cornell, Missouri, California, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Ohio State, Penn State, Michigan State, Indiana and Illinois.

Labor Studies Center Director Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., said that international unions whose members are significantly affected by the job safety law are being asked to assign officers and staff to the institutes.

Hoehler noted that the week-long courses will stress not only thorough understanding and application of the law, but also techniques of organizing and training job safety committees.

The Institutes are scheduled for: Cornell, Ithaca, N.Y., Nov. 30-Dec. 3; University of Missouri at Columbia, Dec. 6-10; University of California at Berkeley, Dec. 13-16; University of Massachusetts, Amherst, and University of Wisconsin, Madison, Jan. 10-13; Ohio State University, Columbus, Jan. 16-21; Pennsylvania State University, University Park, Jan. 30-Feb. 4; Michigan State University, East Lansing, Feb. 7-11; Indiana University, Bloomington, Feb. 13-18, and University of Illinois, Champaign, Mar. 27-29.

The Labor Studies Center is handling the recruiting and reservations for the institutes. Applications should be sent to the center, 1500 Massachusetts Ave. N.W., Washington, D.C., 20005 at least six weeks before the sessions start.

By Train Dispatchers:

Forced Arbitration Proposal Assailed

Chicago—The American Train Dispatchers voted firm opposition to enactment of any federal law requiring compulsory arbitration. This came in a resolution passed by the union's 21st general assembly.

The resolution also reaffirmed the Dispatchers' support for existing laws "which have long assured them their basic rights relating to collective bargaining, including the right to voluntarily arbitrate any dispute."

More than 120 delegates and officers gave the association's executive board authority to continue exploring possible merger with other railroad unions "in the interests of economy of operation principally, and strength through amalgamation."

Any merger proposal approved by the board would be submitted to a convention of the ATDA.

Calling Pres. Nixon's economic policy "demonstrably unfair," another resolution stated: "If one section of the economy is asked to sacrifice, then all must do likewise. Let it be known that if any plan is presented that is equitable and fair we will cooperate. If not, we will oppose it."

The convention resolved to continue to avail itself of all action, both individually and in concert with other organizations, to secure prompt handling of disputes.

"Our association and its members must support legislation that will benefit the railroad industry," Pres. C. R. Pfenning said in the legislative portion of his report to the assembly, "providing such legislation does not adversely affect railroad employes.

Pfenning pointed out that all the railroads are making a strong pitch for subsidies from the government.

"There are cures for the railroads' ills," Pfenning insisted, "and I feel we should support whatever is necessary to bring these changes about. . . .

"But we must have built-in safeguards. The railroads must be forced to plow profits back into the railroad industry and not into other outside holdings. Management must rid itself of the free-loading, deadheading, pork-barreling functionaries whose only talent seems to be for mismanagement.

"If it takes some form of government control to accomplish these goals, then that is what we must support. We have a duty both as employes and as taxpayers to see that this is done."

The convention re-elected all incumbent officers except Sec.-Treas. T. J. Lacey, who was not a candidate for a new term. Lacey was succeeded by D. E. Collins, whose place as a union trustee was won in a contest by W. W. Mix, general chairman of the Pennsylvania section of the Penn Central Railroad.

Collins had been deputy president and formerly was general chairman on the Terminal Railroad of St. Louis.

DIPLOMAS ARE PRESENTED to the 38th graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development by Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Jogo Capalbo, right, of the Federation of Agricultural Workers of Brazil, is one of the 40 graduates.

Multinational Abuses Spur Global Unionism

Organized labor throughout the free world must unite to "raise the standard of wages and working conditions" whever a multinational corporation sets up shop "solely on the basis of exploration of cheap labor," Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers declared.

Addressing the 38th graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, Keenan called on labor to learn to overcome national boundaries just as private capital has.

"In the face of the multinational corporations and gigantic conglomerates on an international scale, we must now, more than ever, unite in an unprecedented example of workers' solidarity to prevent exploitation of our fellow trade unionists in the form of low wages and sub-standard working conditions," he said.

Keenan urged the 40 Latin American graduates to use the training they had received under the AIFLD program to "insure that increases in productivity are met with commensurate increases in wages and benefits through collective bargaining so that all people benefit from progress."

He stressed that labor must not permit economic giants to shift production from one country to another, evading the just and legal aspirations of workers.

This, he said, "is nothing more than plain old-fashioned union busting."

As a final note, Keenan asserted that "only under freedom and democracy can a strong democratic labor movement exist." He urged the Latin American unionists to continue to work closely with the AFL-CIO because "our tie is the tie of brotherhood."

AIFLD Executive Director William C. Doherty also urged the graduates, who had spent eight weeks at the AIFLD center in Front Royal Va., to return home and work for the "solidarity of labor."

Joseph Skeete, who is general secretary of the Confederation of Panama Trade Unions, spoke for the class saying, "this is a significant moment for the workers of Latin America inasmuch as the labor movement is more and more a cornerstone in the destiny of nations."

"Education has a significant part in this structure. . . . The labor education courses organized by the AIFLD in every country have been and will continue to be of great assistance."

The speaker at the graduation luncheon was the newly named director of education of the AIFLD, William A. Douglas.

He outlined the long-range educational goals of the institute and said that their attainment depends on "realizing the importance of labor education, getting qualified teachers, improving the teaching methods, and supporting the new methods with improved text material."

5¢ Per Capita Increase Voted In Wyoming

Casper, Wyo.—A five-cent increase in the Wyoming AFL-CIO per capita tax was approved by delegates to the state federation's eighth biennial convention. The increase boosts membership dues to 30 cents a month.

The 200 delegates passed a constitutional amendment requiring the federation to hold future conventions annually. Officers will continue to be elected for two-year terms in odd-numbered years.

Pres. Mark E. Nicksic was reelected to his third term. Also reelected were Vice Pres. Glenn Sween and executive board members Paul Johnson, Kenneth Lamb and Everett Mann.

Roger Richardson of Cheyenne was elected to his first term on the board, succeeding F. E. Tomlin, who resigned for health reasons.

The board reappointed Keith Henning to a full two-year term as executive secretary. Henning was initially appointed to the full-time post last November.

The convention called on the state legislature to update Wyoming's election law, specifically citing the need to standardize voter registration procedures in all 23 counties.

Delegates also urged repeal of the state "right-to-work" law and legislation to provide collective bargaining rights for public employes.

In resolutions dealing with federal legislation, the convention asked Congress to impose a ceiling on rising interest rates, including machinery to roll back excessive finance charges.

It further urged Congress to complete the unfinished business of tax justice by plugging loopholes for the rich and basing the graduated federal income tax on ability to pay.

Vermont Labor Scores Jobless Benefits Veto

Bennington, Vt.—A veto by Gov. Deane C. Davis of a 13-week extension of state unemployment benefits was condemned by delegates to the 16th annual Vermont AFL-CIO convention.

The additional jobless compensation was approved with bipartisan support in the state legislature, but Davis, a Republican, killed the extension on the urging of the commissioner of Employment Security.

The 13-week extension was aimed at bringing financial relief for the unemployed in the state's job disaster areas. The jobless rate in some sections of Vermont is reported to range from 15 to 21 percent.

Organized labor plans to campaign for a vastly improved jobless benefits bill in the next session of the legislature, based on recommendations of state labor council Pres. Ralph E. Williams to the Employment Security Advisory Board. Williams is one of three members representing labor on the board.

Among Williams' proposals are extension of coverage to all workers, an increase in benefits to at least 66⅔ percent of the average state wage, and elimination of the waiting period on claims.

The convention approved a change in the state labor council's constitution to increase the terms of officers from one to two years.

Williams was re-elected to his 11th consecutive term and Sec.-Treas. Arthur E. George to his fourth term. Delegates also re-elected executive board members Robert Clark, first vice president; Jane Noury, women's activities director, and Marion Pierce, at-large member.

The convention adopted 28 resolutions, including support for passage of National Health Security, a federal "no-fault" auto insurance law, orderly regulation of all imports and nationalization of American railroads.

Delegates also condemned Phase One of Pres. Nixon's wage-price freeze for the unfair burden it places on workers and its "trickle down" theory that fails to meet the real needs of the people.

Glass Workers Get Trade Aid

The Labor Dept. has certified about 400 glass workers at a Shreveport, La., plant as eligible for trade adjustment assistance because they lost their jobs due to imports of sheet glass.

They are members of the Glass & Ceramic Workers and the Glass Cutters, the two unions which petitioned the Labor Dept. on behalf of the Shreveport workers.

Last April, the Libby-Owens-Ford Co. plant began laying off the production workers. By the end of September only clerical employes were still working.

The certified workers will be eligible for cash readjustment allowances up to $87 a week for one year.

Nebraskans Push Battle Against 'Right-to-Work'

North Platte, Neb.—The Nebraska AFL-CIO voted at its convention here to continue the battle against a state "right to work" law amendment and provided permanent financing for the fight.

Delegates to the 16th annual convention approved a motion to transfer two cents of an existing four-cent assessment into the general fund. The money will be earmarked to finance the fight against a "work" law amendment forbidding agency shop contracts, Pres. Richard W. Nisley and Sec.-Treas. Nels F. Petersen said.

The state body has been fighting since 1961 to repeal an amendment passed by the state legislature. The latest court ruling in the case requires that a suit be filed by an individual, not by a group. A test case will be filed within 90 days, Nisley said.

The convention mandated the officers to "continue to seek repeal of this unjust and unconstitutional amendment." The state body believes the amendment is unconstitutional because it was an act of the legislature and not the voting public.

The effect of the fund transfer is to reduce the assessment and to raise the per capita tax for affiliated unions from 17 cents a month per member to 19 cents. The legal fight will be financed in the future from the general fund, instead of by means of a temporary assessment.

The convention, with 238 delegates attending, voted to oppose the Nixon wage-price freeze as unfair and discriminatory to wage earners and as favoring employers and profit-takers. Also it approved a $1,000 annual increase in the officers' salaries, if and when the freeze permits, and made other constitutional changes.

The convention voted backing for National Health Security, and urged an amendment in the state workmen's compensation law to provide benefits for dependents of injured workers. Also it called for improved benefits for public employes including a better retirement plan and unemployment compensation.

Convention speakers included Gov. J. J. Exon (D), Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), Pres. Herrick Roth of the Colorado AFL-CIO, and Charles Snavely, attorney for the Federal Trade Commission.

The state body will elect officers at its 1972 convention in Lincoln.

Two days after the convention ended, delegates learned of the unexpected death of Robert Danze, a member of the Asbestos Workers who was president of the Omaha AFL-CIO. Special balloting will be necessary to fill Danze's place as a member of the state executive board.

Administration Rebuffed:

Congress Overrides School Lunch Cuts

It announced that it would restore funds for all children certified as eligible by the states and would raise the amount of the subsidy as desired by Congress.

But Congress was no longer willing to accept the Administration's promises. The House voted 353-0 to write the higher payments and continued eligibility into law, and the Senate on Oct. 20 approved the House-passed bill intact.

In another legislative area, the House took up and passed a bill establishing an independent Consumer Protection Agency after rejecting amendments that would have curtailed or expanded its powers.

As passed by a 344-44 vote, the bill would authorize the new agency to intervene on behalf of consumers before regulatory agencies that set standards or rules affecting the public and in a broad range of court cases.

In hearings on rules and standards conducted by other government departments, the consumer agency could enter as a party to the case, with the right to present witnesses, subpoena evidence and cross-examine other witnesses. But if the hearing were initiated to consider a penalty for violation of a federal law or regulation, the agency's powers of intervention would be more limited.

The House voted 240-149 against an amendment curbing the agency's powers and then voted 218-160 against an amendment giving it additional powers.

The legislation now goes to the Senate, which last year approved a consumer agency bill by a one-sided vote—only to have the legislation die in the House when the Rules Committee refused on a tie vote to let a consumer agency bill come to the floor.

The Senate took up the never-settled question of procedures for holding a constitutional convention on the petition of two-thirds of the states—and ended up with 84-0 approval of a bill laying down ground rules.

Although there have been some close calls, the constitutional convention method specified in the Constitution has never been used. If the House were to accept the Senate bill, here's how it would be done:

- In determining whether two-thirds of the states have petitioned for a convention, only actions taken within a seven-year period would be valid.
- Each state would be entitled to a number of delegates equal to its representation in both houses of Congress, either elected or appointed by the governor.
- The convention would meet within one year and would have one year to complete its business.
- It would be prohibited from considering any constitutional change other than the subject matter of the petition.
- A two-thirds majority of the convention would be required to propose an amendment. The original bill, sponsored by Sen. Sam J. Ervin (D-N.C.), would have required only a majority vote. But the Senate voted 45-39 approval of an amendment by Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) imposing a two-thirds requirement.
- After adoption by the convention, an amendment would then have to be ratified by three-fourths of the states within seven years in order to become a part of the Constitution.

The closest a petition drive for a constitutional convention has come was reached in 1969 when 33 states called for an amendment rescinding the one-man, one-vote reapportionment of legislatures that had been ordered by the Supreme Court. That was only one short of the needed two-thirds. But several states since rescinded their resolutions and the drive lost most of its steam after the death of Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.).

Currently, the principal push for a constitutional convention is an effort to write a revenue-sharing amendment into the Constitution. Eleven states are reported to have adopted resolutions to that effect.

'Help!'

Stiff Law Urged to Halt Deceptive Sales Tactics

repair or replace the defective article, or to refund the purchase price.

"Too often the product guarantee is a sales gimmick, not a true commitment to back up the product," Peterson testified.

The warranty section of the bill would:

- Require that the warranty state clearly and explicitly the terms of coverage, what the consumer must do to invoke it, and what his rights are if the promise of the warranty is not fulfilled.
- Define a full warranty as a promise to repair or replace a defective product within a reasonable time and without charge. Any lesser promise would have to be labeled a "partial" warranty to alert the buyer to the limited nature of the guarantee.
- Specify that the terms of a warranty do not excuse the seller from his normal responsibility for the good condition of the goods he sells.
- Direct payment of costs and reasonable attorney fees if a buyer wins a court suit for breach of warranty or service contract. The rules for combining a number of consumer claims into a "class action" suit would be liberalized.
- Authorize court injunctions against deceptive warranties.

Under the second part of the bill, the power of the Federal Trade Commission would be substantially broadened—and it is this section that has come under sharpest attack from industry.

The bill would authorize the Federal Trade Commission to issue standards barring a broad range of unfair or deceptive business practices. It would then only be necessary to find that a firm violated the rules, instead of the present time-consuming case-by-case procedure of matching the firm's practice against the broad language of the legislation.

Importantly, the bill would enable the FTC to fine companies for violation of its rules and to require them to compensate consumers for losses they have suffered.

Under present law, the FTC can merely issue "cease and desist" orders and firms are not liable for a penalty unless they subsequently violate the orders and are found in contempt of court. And the consumer who brings a complaint receives no redress through the FTC procedure.

Peterson told the subcommittee that "the inability of consumers to strike back at businesses which have defrauded and cheated them is undoubtedly a major reason why marketplace swindles continue as a large scale public problem."

A similar bill has already been approved by the Senate Commerce Committee—in place of an Administration measure which would merely clarify the question of warranty coverage.

Wage Violator Draws Fine, Jail Sentence

Miami—A six-month sentence to jail and a $19,000 penalty payment were imposed on a Fort Lauderdale employer who ignored court orders to pay back wages due 27 employes under the wage-hour law.

The Labor Dept. said Alex Fidanian, head of VIP Answering Service, Inc., Fort Lauderdale, is the first employer in 20 years to receive a jail sentence for violating the Fair Labor Standards Act. Fidanian posted $2,500 bond pending appeal in U.S. District Court here, the department announced.

Eighteen months ago Fidanian was ordered to stop ignoring the wage and overtime provisions of the law and also was ordered to pay his employes $3,000 due them. He defaulted on backpay and was found guilty of civil and criminal contempt of court.

A District Court judge ruled that he had continued to underpay his employes after the original order was issued. The court ordered Fidanian to pay $19,000 for defying the law. This included the balance due under the original order, plus $11,700 owed to employes since April 1970, and $4,871 for the expense of prosecution and investigation.

Fidanian faces imprisonment in the federal penitentiary at Tallahassee, Fla., if the appeal is overruled. The legal action against him was brought by the Labor Dept.'s wage and hour division office in Fort Lauderdale.

The AFL-CIO and its unions have long urged more inspections of business establishments, a more adequate inspection staff and better enforcement of the wage-hour law.

CWA Asks Ruling Allowing Unions To Buy Air Time During Disputes

The Communications Workers have called for a federal ruling that would require broadcasters to permit unions to air their views during negotiations and strikes.

The request stems from incidents earlier this year when the three major networks—CBS, ABC and NBC—refused to sell air time to the CWA. A subsequent CWA complaint was rejected by the Federal Communications Commission but an appeals court is now considering the case.

In May, the CWA attempted to purchase a half-hour of television time from the three networks to cover a union meeting during which the state of negotiations between the CWA and the Bell System would be discussed.

Although the CWA gave no other description of what would be aired on the program, all three networks refused to sell the time on the ground that the program would be "controversial."

But CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne pointed out that during the union's nationwide strike in July, "various operating companies of the Bell System continued to enjoy access to commercial broadcasting."

The broadcasting companies did not judge the Bell advertising content in any way "controversial," Beirne stressed in his letter to FCC Sec. Ben F. Waple.

Yet, throughout the strike, Beirne noted, "the tenor of the 'spot' advertisements (1) was an apology for any inconveniences due to the strike, and (2) suggested ways of minimizing delays in telephone service."

"Although the Bell System's intent in these advertisements was to minimize the union's effectiveness in maintaining the strike," he said, "the broadcasters made no attempts either to terminate the company messages nor to offer the union comparable paid time to use for its own purposes."

The current CWA complaint, the union noted, is pertinent to the inquiry opened by the FCC June 19 on the application of the "fairness doctrine" in broadcasting. It also involves access to broadcast media for carriage of product commercials.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its August meeting in San Francisco called on the FCC to "broaden and liberalize its fairness and related doctrines."

The point stressed by the council was that "the same networks and stations which have permitted private corporations to use commercials to publicize their points of view on controversial public issues have rejected applications by non-profit organizations and groups to buy time to discuss public issues on the ground that it is contrary to the policy of the network or station."

Both the American Association of Railroads and the Bell System, the council noted, broadcast commercials during recent strikes which were disguised as institutional advertising.

While the commercials "argued the employers' side of the pending labor disputes," the statement said, the "stations which carried this employer propaganda did not offer the unions time to answer."

Herbert Dawson, URW Aide, Dies

Akron—Herbert D. Dawson, who pioneered in organizing rubber industry workers, died at 63.

Dawson was active in organizing AFL rubber workers in 1933. Three years later he joined URW Local 5 while working at the B. F. Goodrich Co. plant, and was named a staff organizer by Sherman H. Dalrymple, founding president of the URW, in 1937. Later he was a principal aide to Dalrymple, Pres. L. S. Buckmaster and current Pres. Peter Bommarito.

Perlik, Crocker Slate Sweeps Guild Elections

Pres. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., and Sec.-Treas. Robert M. Crocker have been certified for new, two-year terms as heads of The Newspaper Guild.

Perlik had defeated Brian L. Flores of Washington and Crocker was victorious over Ned Sweet of San Antonio.

All six members of the Perlik-Crocker slate for at-large vice presidents were also elected. Glen Ogilvie of Toronto was defeated by James Young of Vancouver-New Westminster for the Canadian regional vice presidency.

The Election & Referendum Committee found "irregularities" in the Washington-Baltimore unit and set aside 260 ballots.

A controversy over the role of The Guild Reporter in the election was referred to TNG's executive board meeting in Toronto.

Meany Bars 'Blank Check' On Nixon Economic Power

Meany Testifies:

Quality Care Held Compelling Issue

"There is no more compelling issue" before Congress than passage of a National Health Security program, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the House Ways & Means Committee.

And no other bill before the committee, he stressed, would achieve the goal of quality health care for all Americans—as a matter of right, without distinction based on income or age, and at a cost the nation can afford.

The 25-member committee is holding hearings on a wide assortment of bills dealing with a generally acknowledged health care crisis in the nation. In addition to the labor-supported National Health Security bill, introduced by five committee members, these include alternatives backed by the Nixon Administration, the American Medical Association and the insurance industry.

Meany, the first public witness called by the committee, sharply challenged the contention that the Health Security measure—the most comprehensive of the bills being considered—would be too costly.

One way or another, Meany said, the American people pay the full cost of health care.

They pay for it in doctor and hospital bills, in taxes and in insurance premiums, he noted. They pay for the waste and inefficiency of the present system of delivery and financing of health services. They pay for the heavy adminis-

Prices Rise As Earnings Post Decline

Prices rose and workers' real earnings fell during September as it became apparent that some products were slipping past Pres. Nixon's price freeze order while employers were doing an excellent job of enforcing the freeze on wages.

The Consumer Price Index rose two-tenths of 1 percent for the month to 122.4. This meant that it cost a worker $12.24 to buy the same cross-section of goods and services he paid $10 for in 1967. And in terms of the old 1957-59 base period, it cost $14.23 to buy what cost $10 then.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that preliminary figures showed real spendable earnings for a rank-and-file worker with three

Asks Limits By Congress On Authority

By David L. Perlman

The Nixon Administration can't be trusted with "blank-check" authority to manage the nation's economy, the AFL-CIO warned.

Its "dismal failures" during the first phase of the stabilization program compel Congress to write into law necessary standards of fairness and equality of sacrifice, Federation Pres. George Meany told the House Banking Committee.

The AFL-CIO testified against blanket acceptance of the Administration bill extending the President's emergency economic powers an additional year beyond the April 30, 1972, expiration date of the present law. The Administration bill would also expand the President's powers over the economy and give retroactive legal approval to all actions taken under his executive order freezing wages and most prices.

Meany charged that the Nixon Administration, by its "disastrous" economic blunders, has "forfeited" public confidence that it will use its powers wisely.

"It would be a serious mistake," Meany said, for Congress "to extend the President's authority for one day, much less one year," until the Phase II program has been tested in operation.

His testimony, presented by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, said labor agrees that the President needs "substantial" discretionary powers in order

U.S. Defeat in UN Tied To Nixon China Policy

The "crushing defeat" suffered by the United States on the expulsion of the Republic of China from the United Nations is the result of "Pres. Nixon's newest China policy" geared to "a course of appeasement," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The expulsion of the Republic of China and the placement of the Communist Chinese regime on the Security Council "has dealt a fatal blow to the UN as an instrument of international harmony, peace and freedom," Meany said in a statement after the UN vote.

He recalled that on Aug. 10, 1971, the AFL-CIO Executive Council in a statement on Nixon's new China policy, warned that the League of Nations had been doomed when "it turned its back on its basic aims . . . and betrayed Ethiopia to the Fascist aggressor." He added: "Unfortunately, this time by warning was not heeded."

Meany pointed out that the U.S. ambassador to the UN, George Bush, "has appropriately characterized this development as a 'moment of infamy.' "

The text of Meany's statement:

"The crushing defeat suffered by the United States in the United Nations was hardly avoidable under Pres. Nixon's newest China policy. The decisive vote to expel from

Labor 'Deeply Disturbed':

BLS Changes Keyed To Political Issues

By Tom Castor

Organized labor is "deeply disturbed" by the apparent attempt by the Nixon Administration "to politicize the Bureau of Labor Statistics," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared as he called on Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson to reverse proposed changes in the bureau's operation and structure.

"The announcement . . . that the publication of quarterly reports on employment and unemployment conditions in urban poverty areas will be discontinued during 1972—incidentally an election year—is the most recent of the shocking examples of what is happening to the BLS," Meany said in a letter to Hodgson.

"It came on the heels of the reorganization of the agency with shifts and downgrading of key career personnel, combined with the separation of interpretation of economic data from the collection and analysis of such information," Meany said.

"That development, in turn, came only a few months after career, non-partisan statisticians were barred from the long-time practice of interpreting monthly employment-unemployment reports at public press briefings."

The briefings, on both job figures and the Consumer Price Index, were canceled last March after Assistant BLS Commissioner Harold Goldstein told newsmen that February unemployment statistics were

Deferred Increases Confront Pay Board

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the most important issue confronting the new Pay Board is the question of deferred wage increases which were not given to workers during the 90-day wage-price freeze.

On the part of the workers, Meany said, "there is a keen sense of injustice and feeling that they are being unfairly treated."

Meany made the comments during a public affairs television interview in Washington the day before Pres. Nixon named him and 14 others to the tripartite Pay Board and at the same time set up the seven-member Price Commission. Both groups have since been sworn in and have begun grappling with the task of developing wage and price policies for the post-freeze.

During the television interview, dependents fell by 33 cents in September to $92.06, one of the largest monthly drops in the past year.

"This is convincing proof the price freeze is not working and that workers are paying the price," AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger commented on the report.

"Coupled with the slackening GNP, these statistics are compelling reasons for our continued grave concern that the Administration's economic policies are misguided," he said.

The gross national product rose 3 percent in the third quarter as compared to 5 percent in the previous three-month period. A gain of 4 percent is considerd normal and it must be higher than that if unemployment is to be reduced.

Some workers sending their children to college were hard hit by an average 9 percent increase in college tuition payments—which are exempt from the freeze.

Paradoxically, food prices—especially prices for fresh food which are not subject to the freeze—declined.

Overall supermarket prices dropped 1 percent in the August-September period, nearly twice as much as could be expected at this time of year.

The prices of fruits and vegetables which usually decline at harvest time, took a dramatic 5.7 percent drop in September.

But other supermarket items—processed items not exempt from the freeze, such as margarine, salad oil, frozen orange juice and some cuts of beef—rose, as did restaurant meals, by four-tenths of 1 per cent.

The price of women's and girls' apparel took a sharp 2.6-point increase during September, and a special survey by one regional BLS office revealed that 7 percent of nonfood items increased in price between Aug. 15 and Sept. 30, regardless of the freeze.

Paul W. McCracken, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, said there would be an investigation of "possible violations" of the freeze.

Other prices that rose despite the freeze were those of meats, poultry, fish, household furnishings, homeownership costs, shoes and recreation.

In the case of apparel, the BLS said "it is not possible to determine from data used in the CPI whether allowable seasonaal increases accounted for all the rise in apparel prices."

The BLS further maintained in a news release that "most of the increase in the September index for items covered by the freeze occurred prior to Aug. 15, or was due to seasonal or other price changes which, under certain conditions are permissible under the freeze."

If the effects of price changes on those of the 400 CPI components exempt from the freeze were excluded from tabulation, "the index would have increased four tenths of 1 percent," the BLS said.

The quarterly increase in the CPI was the lowest since late 1967, except for the 2.8 percent rate achieved during the second quarter of this year when mortgage interest rates were declining.

Statewide Unit Of Teachers Formed in N. Y.

Kiamesha Lake, N.Y.—Delegates from more than 100 local unions of the Teachers attended the first convention of the United Teachers of New York State, successor body to the New York State Federation of Teachers. They set as their major objective building a union that can effectively organize the state's 300,000 teachers into a single organization.

"The old issues are dead," said Albert Shanker, who heads the new body. He will continue also as president of the United Federation of Teachers, AFT Local 2, New York City. "The new programs confronting us are not just those of the bargaining table, but those whose only solutions lie in united political action."

Teachers cannot handle these problems alone, and particularly not in two rival organizations—the UTNY and the State Teachers Association, he emphasized.

Some 450 delegates from all over the state elected a 50-member executive council including three top officers, 11 vice presidents and 36 at-large members. The council named Dan Sanders, assistant to the UFT president, as executive director.

The new structure, overwhelmingly approved earlier this month in local union votes, will enable the state organization to function with a $4 million budget. It plans an increase in state staff from five organizers to 50 full-time staff members in 10 or more regional offices; greatly expanded lobbying activities, assumption by the state body of local arbitration and court costs, and effective research department, and a weekly newspaper.

Meany Challenges Cost Factor:

Health Security Plan Called Key to Quality Care for All

trative costs, the advertising and sales expenses, of third-party insurance firms.

And, Meany observed, they pay the high price of letting illnesses go untreated or undetected because of the cost of medical treatment and regular check-ups.

Meany, who was joined at the witness table by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller and Social Security Director Bert Seidman, noted that he and the other union representatives had testified many times in support of major social legislation. But, he stressed, "I know of no measure that is more important, more vital, and which enjoys such overwhelming support among workers as National Health Security."

The House committee does not plan to begin closed-door consideration of the various health care bills until early next year, in the second session of Congress.

Meany strongly urged that it face up squarely to "the basic right of all Americans to receive quality health care."

He said he hoped that labor "won't have to come back in the next Congress" to repeat its call for effective legislation.

"But if we have to, we will come back again and again until the Health Security program is enacted. And if we have to, we will take this issue to the people in the elections of 1972."

Meany spelled out the basic benefits in the Health Security bill, whose sponsors on the Ways & Means Committee are Democratic Representatives Martha W. Griffiths (Mich.), James C. Corman (Calif.), James A. Burke (Mass.), Charles A. Vanik (Ohio) and William J. Green (Pa.).

These include all necessary physician services from preventive medicine through surgery, all hospital expenses and costs, outpatient care, most drug costs, psychiatric treatment, full dental care for children under 15 and other professional health services.

"There would be no deductibles, no co-insurance, no exclusions and no waiting periods," Meany noted. "There would be no cut-offs in dollars, age or numbers of days for the most important elements of health care — physicians' services and hospital care."

Doctors would be encouraged, but not required, to join prepaid group practice plans, "a far more rational method of delivering health care . . . less costly, more efficient and better for doctor and patient alike."

Or they could set up an area foundation that would negotiate a comprehensive fee covering health services to all the people in the area—and arrange its own method of paying individual doctors for their services.

And doctors insisting on going it alone could still have a choice of individual payment plans, based either on the number of patients served or on the services performed.

The separate Medicare tax would be eliminated. Employers would pay 3.5 percent of payroll, the self-employed would pay 2.5 percent of income up to $15,000, and employes would pay 1 percent of income under $15,000.

The balance—about half the cost of the program—would come from the federal treasury.

"The trade union movement believes this is a wise expenditure," Meany told the committee. "We aren't here to apologize for it, or to make it appear smaller than it really is. A cheap health care program would be just that—cheap."

The estimated cost of the total Health Security program in 1974, its first full year, would be $56.7 billion, Meany noted.

But he warned that unless a National Health Security program is enacted, Americans will end up paying substantially more for inferior care.

By contrast, Meany testified, the proposals of the Administration, the insurance companies and the AMA "would all just pour new money into the present health care delivery system which is a failure."

The AMA's "medicredit" plan would use income tax credits to offset part of the premium cost of private health insurance purchased by the taxpayer. Those who pay no taxes would receive a certificate for full payment of the premium—including, Meany noted, "the millionaires who pay no taxes because of loopholes in the tax laws."

But the policies they would receive "pay out in benefits only about half the amount collected in premiums, because the insurance companies use the other half for advertising, profits, commissions, overhead, duplicate paperwork—all of which would be eliminated by National Health Security."

The insurance company bill, Meany noted, "attempts to slough off high risks on the government, while preserving the profitable market for the insurance industry." And the Administration bill "is shockingly inadequate. Benefits for the poor are very limited."

Like the other bills, it would be a windfall for the insurance industry and invite "further escalation of medical costs, as experienced under Medicare and Medicaid."

Meany told the committee that "the idea that the strong take care of themselves and pass along a few crumbs to the weak is repulsive to us and runs counter to the philosophy of the American trade union movement."

He warned that "America is not going to solve its medical care crisis as long as we have multiple classes of medical care—one for the rich, one for the poor, one for trade union members, another for the elderly, still another for unorganized workers."

Appealing to Congress to respond quickly to the nation's need for reform of the health care system, Meany concluded: "The hour is late and the cause is great."

2 Pamphlets Issued On Health Security

Two new AFL-CIO pamphlets help make labor's case for its top legislative goal—National Health Security.

Both are avaliable without cost for distribution by unions at meetings and through mailings. Requests for copies should be sent to the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

"Health Security — Best Buy for Union Members" explains the relationship between union health and welfare plans and the Health Security proposal.

"Catastrophic Insurance—Blessing or Disguise?" examines this limited form of protection in comparison with the comprehensive coverage of a complete health program.

Still available are two earlier publications, "Q&A on Health Security" and "National Health Security, Fact Sheet No. 1."

2 Challenges Rejected On Nixon Wage Freeze

Federal courts have rejected two suits by trade unions challenging Pres. Nixon's wage freeze, but the issues raised may yet reach the Supreme Court.

A three-judge federal district court considered and turned down a challenge by the Meat Cutters to the constitutionality of the law Pres. Nixon invoked for his wage-price freeze.

The court acknowledged that the constitutional issue is "fraught with difficulty" because of the "broad discretion given to the President" by the Economic Stabilization Act. But it said precedents uphold the authority of Congress to delegate substantial powers to the President, and it cited congressional committee reports as evidence that Congress knew what it was doing when it passed the basic legislation.

The union said the government had no right to deny payment of negotiated pay raises for some 150,000 members that came due during the 90-day freeze period, including 25-cent hourly increases that 50,000 employes of major meat packing firms were to have received on Sept. 6.

Union attorneys indicated they plan to appeal the decision to the Supreme Court.

In another case, a federal district court judge rejected the suit brought by the principal postal unions contending that the Postal Reorganization Act specifically provided that wages set by collective bargaining could not be altered by other congressional acts. Here, too, the union plans an appeal.

Meanwhile, Pres. Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers announced that four IBEW locals are bringing suit for back wages on narrower grounds — that the freeze order was incorrectly interpreted to bar a wage increase at four Western Electric plants.

Sixteen IBEW locals, including the four bringing the suit, jointly negotiated a uniform pay raise in July, prior to the freeze, covering some 75,000 workers. Twelve of the contracts took effect before the freeze, and the workers received the pay raise.

But four contracts, covering 3,500 workers doing similar work, did not take effect until Aug. 17—just after the freeze. And management contended it could not pay the increase to this group.

The suit challenges this contention and charges that Western Electric has breached its collective bargaining agreement.

Bars 'Blank Check' for Nixon:

Meany Asks Limits On Control Powers

to carry out an effective stabilization program.

But the President's powers should not be "unlimited." In fact, Meany urged, to restore public confidence, the law should make clear the intent of Congress that no one segment of society be singled out while other groups do "business as usual."

Controls on wages, he stressed, must be joined with "equitable controls on all forms of income—corporate as well as personal, partnership as well as individual, unearned as well as earned."

Meany told the committee the labor movement has demonstrated its "good faith in the fight to control inflation" and is cooperating with the machinery set up for wage controls.

He told also of the labor watchdog units set up across the nation to check prices because the President's order "has not provided adequate enforcement machinery to control prices."

But Meany served firm notice that the length of time the trade union movement will cooperate with the stabilization program depends on "the Administration's commitment to equality of sacrifice."

And, he cautioned, "if anyone thinks the American worker will sacrifice alone while every other segment of American society does business as usual, he just doesn't know Americans."

In other areas, the AFL-CIO testimony:

- Urged a requirement for Senate confirmation of public members of the Pay Board and the Price Commission.
- Called on Congress to establish selective credit controls, interest ceilings on certain types of loans and "an allocation of credit which will stimulate balanced economic growth and increased employment."

Congress gave the President such powers in 1969, Meany noted, but "to this day, he has failed to use or even to fully and candidly acknowledge the existence of this authority."

- Proposed that, instead of mere "stand-by" authority to control dividends, there should be an excess profits curb on profits, dividends and capital gains. "Without such a measure, there is no equality of sacrifice, no parity between what is given business and what is forced upon workers."
- Promised that labor would support any move to exempt wages below the poverty level from controls.
- Raised a series of questions regarding the procedures of court review and enforcement proceedings on wage and price decisions, and the role of the proposed Emergency Court of Appeals. The "abominable draftsmanship" of the Administration's legislative proposals leaves many such questions unanswered.
- Opposed outright the retroactive approval of Cost of Living Council decisions, which the Administration has requested. But if Congress should decide otherwise, it certainly should make it clear that the new Pay Board has the power to approve retroactive payment of frozen wage and benefit increases. Meany noted that the Administration has said the Pay Board has such power, but the legislation it submitted does not bear out that assurance.
- Called for effective enforcement machinery for price controls and stiffer penalties for price-gougers than the modest fines provided in the Administration bill.

And Meany reminded the committee that curbing inflation—important as it is—will not in itself restore prosperity.

"America will never resolve her economic problems until widespread unemployment is eliminated," Meany stressed. And "nothing in the Administration's economic program will even make a dent in the unemployment problem."

PAY BOARD AND PRICE COMMISSION members are sworn in to administer Phase II of Pres. Nixon's new economic program. The 15-member tripartite Pay Board, top, which includes five labor representatives, receives the oath from John J. Ratchford, executive clerk at the White House. The Price Commission is sworn in by Donald Rumsfeld, director of the Cost of Living Council.

Deferred Boosts Pose Key Issue As Pay Board Tackles Phase 2

Meany said that he and other labor members of the Pay Board would insist on payment of the deferred increases and reiterated that labor has no intention of serving as "honorary pallbearers at our own funeral."

The AFL-CIO president also warned that if workers are not allowed to receive negotiated wage increases due after the freeze ends, "they are going to feel pretty bad and the feeling of inequity and unfairness is going to certainly be developed to even a greater degree than it is now."

Other union officials appointed by Pres. Nixon to the board are Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel, Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith, Auto Workers Pres. Leonard F. Woodcock and Teamsters Pres. Frank E. Fitzsimmons.

Nixon chose U.S. District Judge George H. Boldt of Seattle to head the Pay Board and serve as one of its public members.

Boldt was an Eisenhower appointee to the U.S. District Court for Western Washington in 1953. In 1962 and 1963, he was named to a panel of federal judges to hear hundreds of price-fixing cases against major electrical companies.

Other public members of the Pay Board are:

Arnold R. Weber—He was Pres. Nixon's hand-picked man as executive director of the Cost of Living Council during the 90-day freeze, a post he has now resigned. Weber is a former deputy director of the Office of Management & Budget and was Assistant Labor Secretary for Manpower.

William C. Caples—He has spent much of his legal career sparring with the Steelworkers as a labor negotiator for the Inland Steel Co. He is currently serving as president of Kenyon College.

Kermit Gordon—President of the Brookings Institution since 1967, Gordon was a member of the President's Council of Economic Advisers in 1961-62 and served as director of the Bureau of the Budget.

Dr. Neil H. Jacoby—Described as "one of the country's leading Republican economists," he is currently a professor of business economics and policy at the University of California. He was a member of the CEA during the Eisenhower Administration when Arthur F. Burns was chairman.

The five members appointed to the Pay Board as representatives of business are:

Virgil B. Day—Chief labor negotiator for the General Electric Co., Day has been a GE executive since 1947 and currently is a vice president of the company for business environment.

Robert C. Bassett—He is president of Vertical Marketing, Inc., a magazine publishing firm in Chicago. Before World War II, he was a Republican national committeeman from Wisconsin.

Benjamin F. Biaggini—President and chief executive of the Southern Pacific Co., where he started a business career in 1936, he is known as a hard-driving, tight-fisted executive and a big contributor to Republican campaigns.

Leonard F. McCollum—He is board chairman and former chief executive of the Continental Oil Co., and a director of the Morgan Guaranty Trust Co.

Rocco C. Siciliano—President of the T.I. Corp., a Los Angeles-based holding company for title insurance operations, he has a strong background in labor negotiations. He has served as Under Secretary of Commerce under Nixon and as an Assistant Labor Secretary during the Eisenhower Administration.

To head the new Price Commission, the President named Charles J. Grayson, dean of the Business School of Southern Methodist University.

Other members of the price panel are: William T. Coleman Jr., Negro lawyer, who served as chairman of the White House Conference on Civil Rights in 1965; Robert F. Lanzillotti, professor of economics and dean of the college of business at the University of Florida; James W. Newman, former chief of Dun & Bradstreet, Inc.; John W. Queenan, former managing partner of Haskins & Sells, an international accounting firm; William W. Scranton, former Republican governor of Pennsylvania, who has served Nixon in many capacities, and Dr. Marina von Neumann Whitman, professor of economics at the University of Pittsburgh.

Cash Buildup Refutes Business Poverty Plea

The Nixon Administration refused to freeze profits at the time it froze wages and prices because it said profits were too low. But a Wall Street Journal article makes it clear that the picture for American corporations is far from gloomy when the total cash flowing into their coffers is considered.

The accelerated tax write-off for depreciation, handed to business last January by the Administration, is the prime reason for corporate cash buildup, the article said, but it noted also that corporate profits actually are increasing.

"The main factor in the corporate cash buildup, economists claim, is the rapidly rising amount that companies have recently been deducting from pre-tax profits for the depreciation of such fixed assets as machine tools," according to the Journal.

The article noted that with Phase II of Pres. Nixon's new economic program approaching ". . . much has been made of the lagging profit record—especially by management spokesmen fearful of any more to control profit increases in coming months. . . .

"When the rise in depreciation is taken into account, however, the picture appears much less gloomy."

For example, in the second quarter of 1971, corporate profits amounted to $46 billion.

But, in addition, companies were allowed to write off $64 billion in depreciation, for a total cash flow of $110 billion, as compared to $94.9 billion in the third quarter of 1969.

The Journal article predicted a rosy future for corporate business:

". . . Most forecasters are convinced that corporate profits are in the middle of a sustained rise, a trend that obviously would further strengthen corporate balance sheets.

"Normally, such a rise in profits would be followed by a boost in dividend payments. But the Nixon Administration has placed heavy pressure on corporations not to increase dividends while the fight against inflation goes on.

"As a result, some analysts say, corporations will find themselves with even more cash than would normally be kept on hand after an improvement in operations."

Ruling Makes Monitoring Of Prices More Difficult

Shoppers—and labor-sponsored "watchdog" committees—will have a harder time finding out whether stores are violating the price freeze as the government's Cost of Living Council bowed to business pressure.

The council had originally ordered all stores to post conspicuously ceiling prices on all products so that buyers would be able to check for violations. It had set Nov. 1 as the deadline for posting.

But after merchants complained that the order was burdensome, the council canceled the deadline and said the only obligation of sellers is to furnish ceiling price information at a customer's specific request by mail within 48 hours. If price lists are not kept at the store for a customer's inspection, the seller must post signs announcing availability of the information.

The council said the price posting deadline was being postponed until the new Price Commission establishes its post-freeze pricing policies.

Shoppers and organizations seeking to check ceiling prices have reported widespread violations of the requirement that ceiling prices be available. The Cost of Living Council promised that Internal Revenue Service employes will conduct a special survey of stores to check on the availability of price information.

For Equality of Sacrifice

WE HAVE DEMONSTRATED our good faith in the fight to control inflation. We've done exactly what we said we'd do. We have already begun to cooperate with the mechanism established for wage controls.

That we are committed to slowing the rising cost of living is clearly highlighted by the establishment of labor watchdog units across the nation to check prices. The President has not provided adequate enforcement machinery to control prices. So American consumers will have to do that enforcement job for the President.

The legislation this Committee is considering deserves the most careful attention and closest scrutiny. This legislation can either set the standard for equality of sacrifice or not. If the legislation does not meet that standard, it will fail to provide America with a workable control mechanism to curb inflation.

Since Aug. 15, America has seen the folly of giving the President blank check authority in this field. There is no need to clutter the record with the details of the Administration's disastrous economic policies.

But an important lesson can—and must—be learned from this experience: that the Congress must be explicit in the authority it grants the President on economic measures.

It must be clear that equality of sacrifice, not the sacrifice of equality, is the intent of Congress.

Equality of sacrifice is what America's working men and women seek. They seek, and they should be guaranteed, equitable controls on all forms of income—corporate as well as personal, partnership as well as individual, unearned as well as earned.

As submitted, this bill does not meet the test of equality of sacrifice.

GIVEN THE ADMINISTRATION'S dismal failures in managing the economy, a vigorous assertion by Congress of its rightful legislative prerogatives is essential if this vital effort is to enjoy the public confidence necessary for its success. The Administration has forfeited its right to that confidence.

We needn't remind this committee that Pres. Nixon opposed the initial Stabilization Act in 1970 and sent a representative to this committee to make that opposition crystal clear.

On Feb. 1, 1971, about six months after the Act was adopted, the President, in his Economic Report to the Congress, stated:

"I do not intend to impose wage and price controls. . . . Neither do I intend to rely upon an elaborate facade that seems to be wage and price control but is not."

Twenty-two days later, Treasury Sec. John Connally appeared before this committee to support a two-year extension of the Act. Making this new position also crystal clear, Mr. Connally, speaking for the Administration, said:

"We do not contemplate any circumstances—short of an all-out national emergency—in which the President would establish general wage-price controls without a further specific mandate from the Congress."

We all know what happened on Aug. 15.

We urge this committee to carefully examine this legislation, to substitute equity for inequity, fairness for injustice, and to restore reason to economic policy. And we don't think you should be stampeded into hasty and ill-considered action.

A Word Edgewise:

Haynsworth-Carswell Fiasco Sires Nixon's Court Game Plan

By John P. Roche

WHENEVER VACANCIES occur on the Supreme Court, the nation is suddenly flooded with waves of piety.

If a liberal Democrat is President, he is called upon to "ignore politics" and appoint only on the basis of legal merit—by the Republicans, of course. When positions are reversed—as they are now—we hear the same solemn litany from the liberals.

Then, off on a track of their own, are the platoons of law professors who invariably chime in with petitions calling for "excellence," which, translated into political patois, means the appointment of law professors to the court.

While all this is going on, serious men on both sides of the political fence are busy trying to pack, or protect the packing of, the court. Like the founding fathers, they realize that the interpretation of the Constitution is (to paraphrase Clemenceau) far too important to be left to professors of constitutional law.

Although the bulk of the work of the Supreme Court is only marginally political, that body can play a crucial role in determinations of public policy. After all, the Warren Court singlehandedly brought down gerrymandering and segregation. In other words, American constitutional law is far more than a juridical exercise; it is a body-contact sport.

The President knows this and so does the Senate. And it is hardly a new and frightening deviation from the "American Way." In 1795, Pres. George Washington named John Rutledge to be Chief Justice of the United States on an interim basis (the Senate was not in session) and he took the oath and served on the court awaiting Senate confirmation.

In the intervening period, Rutledge gave a speech in Charleston, S.C., attacking the Jay Treaty with Britain. The Federalists were infuriated and no sooner did the Senate convene than Rutledge's nomination was rejected, 14-10.

One Senator happily wrote to a friend: "The conduct of the Senate will, I hope, teach demagogues that the road to preferment in this enlightened country is not to revile and calumniate government and excite mobs in opposition to their measures." Jefferson commented: "The rejection of Rutledge by the Senate is a bold thing, for they can not pretend any objection to him but his disapprobation of the treaty."

Thus the President can try to fill the court for his own political ends, and the Senate can try to block his appointments on the same ground. Naturally enough, this process will be camouflaged in high theory. If worst comes to worst, you can always fall back on the law professors and complain that nominees are inadequately educated or lack judicial expertise.

The problem with this is that few justices ever edited law reviews or were notable for their legal knowledge. Besides, they are aided by bright young clerks who can always provide the citations necessary to document a decision.

WHICH BRINGS US BACK to Pres. Nixon and the two vacancies. The President, with perfect legitimacy, wants a conservative court. The Senate, hopefully, wants a liberal court. Having learned a lot from his experience with the Haynsworth and Carswell nominations, Mr. Nixon seems to have devised a game plan.

Recall that after all the in-fighting that went into blocking Haynsworth and Carswell, the Senate almost wept with joy at the chance to approve Justice Blackmun—who is probably just as conservative a judge as either of the two Southerners.

Now the same process of attrition has been brought into play.

Congressman Poff has gone down in smoke, Sen. Robert Byrd put the Senate Democrats at each other's throats, and five other wooden ducks were set afloat—all before any formal nomination came from the White House.

Then, with characteristic aplomb, the President went on TV and pulled two new names from his hat: Lewis F. Powell Jr. and William Rehnquist. Will they whisk through the exhausted Senate like Blackmun to provide two more conservative votes?

Meany Tells Congress:

Health Security Plan Favored For Its Built-in Cost Controls

The following is excerpted from testimony by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany before the House Ways & Means Committee on National Health Security.

WE ARE NOT FRIGHTENED by the cost of Health Security. But we are frightened by what medical care may cost in this country if we do not enact this program.

Health Security would cost approximately $56.7 billion in 1974. It would cover 70 percent of personal health expenditures. The 30 percent that is not covered includes over-the-counter drugs, custodial nursing home and psychiatric care, and dental care for adults.

The total cost of personal health care is going to continue to grow until we get National Health Security and real controls on cost.

One way or another, health consumers are going to continue to pay for health care—be it through taxes or premium payments or out of their own pockets. The difference is that the health consumers are no longer going to keep quiet about costs. It is the health consumers' turn to be heard as to what type of system is needed. The doctors and the insurance companies have run things too long by themselves.

Examine what the proposals of the Administration, the insurance companies and the American Medical Association would do. They would all just pour new money into the present health care delivery system which is a failure.

While the AMA's proposal, "medicredit," represents a major shift in direction for organized medicine, for America it is little more than a continuation of the present, unsatisfactory system of delivering health care.

It would use income tax credits to offset part of the premium cost of private health insurance voluntarily purchased by the taxpayer. Those who have no tax liability, for example, would receive a certificate for full payment of the allowable premiums.

This means that the millionaires who pay no taxes because of loopholes in the tax laws could receive money from the federal government to purchase sickness insurance.

For example, the late Mrs. Dodge, who had an annual income of $1.5 million from tax-free municipal bonds, would have had private health insurance purchased for her by the federal government.

Further, the tax credits would be allowed for the purchase of individual policies only. These policies pay out in benefits only about half the amount collected in premiums, because the insurance companies use the other half for advertising, profits, commissions, overhead, duplicate paperwork—all of which would be eliminated by the National Health Security.

Although the federal government would be paying for health care through tax credits, it would have no say in the distribution of those funds. Insurance companies would continue their present methods of payment, unaccountable to anyone. There would be no improvements in the delivery of health care. And, most importantly, this proposal is utterly void of cost controls.

The insurance companies, on the other hand, want the federal treasury to bankroll the high risk policies keeping the lucrative low risk policies to themselves.

Employers who hire older workers would be forced to pay higher rates than those who hire younger workers. This pattern runs counter to the philosophy of genuine national health insurance where the risk of illness is spread over the entire population.

The concept of "risk" insurance requires additional paperwork for employer, doctor and patient. The goal must be to simplify, not complicate, the procedure by which patients receive medical care.

There is no federal regulation of insurance companies provided in the bill, even though federal revenues, through tax deductions for employer-paid premiums and direct payments for the poor, would be used to purchase health care.

What the AMA and the insurance companies would do is divide up the multi-billion dollar pie of health care expenditures to best protect the same vested interests that have brought health care to the brink of disaster. And the Administration proposal is not that much different despite the liberal rhetoric of the President's health message to Congress.

The Administration bill is shockingly inadequate. It would further fragment the system of health care into many different classes, with differing standards, and each with separate forms that must be filled out.

BENEFITS FOR THE POOR are very limited. For example, those covered by the employer-employe plan would have catastrophic insurance. The poor would not.

The President's message subscribes to the philosophy that "good health care should be readily available to all of our citizens." But, in practice, this bill provides no coverage for the unemployed, part-time and seasonal workers, employes of state and local governments and religious organizations.

The public has been promised there will be some federal regulation of insurance companies. But until these regulations are known—and proven to be effective—we do not see how the Congress could consider giving such a financial windfall to an industry which is not federally regulated and which has proven itself incapable of providing protection against illness to all Americans at reasonable costs.

The fact is that neither the Administration proposal nor the insurance industry proposal nor the AMA's proposal would control costs or protect the health consumer's interest and controls costs.

Only the National Health Security bill protects the consumer.

Confidence Wanes:

Nixon Health Care Measures In Line with Economic Policy

LITTLE HOPE is held on the Nixon Administration's pledge to hold down medical care costs based on the economic policies and health measures it's pushing, declared AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman.

The Administration is "much too beholden to the doctors and the insurance companies for me to have much confidence in what they are going to do," Seidman said on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference. He laid much of the blame for rising health care costs on doctors, who are not meeting their responsibility to control "the utilization of medical care."

He refuted the charge that it is patients seeking unnecessary medical and hospital care who are driving up costs and overtaxing facilities. "The patient can't control the medical care he needs—he doesn't know what medical care he needs," he declared.

"It's the doctor . . . who should be controlling the utilization of medical care," Seidman stressed, by "providing as much as is needed, but no more than is needed." That would happen, he added, "if we had the proper kind of controls on doctors."

Seidman renewed organized labor's strong endorsement of the Kennedy-Griffiths National Health Security proposal as the best of several health care plans now before the Congress. He said the major flaw of other plans, including the one endorsed by the Administration, is the lack of "effective cost controls—both direct and indirect."

He pointed out that the Kennedy-Griffiths bill would establish an annual national budget for health expenditures to be allocated in accordance with the needs of areas and regions throughout the country that would "provide a cost-discipline which would not otherwise exist."

By Press Associates, Inc.

PRES. NIXON'S New Economic Program, with all its boards and panels and commissions and thousands of accompanying words, appears to have given the unemployed almost no priority whatsoever in the new scheme of things.

In his radio and television address to the nation on Oct. 7 announcing Phase II of the NEP, the President had only two fleeting references to "our goal of full employment." Aside from this, the unemployed were completely ignored.

For what it is worth, the "Background Paper on Post-Freeze Economic Stabilization Program" does not even mention the unemployed.

It is rare that any Administration spokesman—including Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, Treasury Sec. John B. Connally, Cost of Living Council Director Donald Rumsfeld and Office of Management & Budget Director George P. Shultz—bothers to concern himself with the unemployment problem.

It's necessary to go all the way back to Aug. 15 when Nixon released his economic bombshell in announcing his wage-price freeze. Then he declared that "we all know why we have an unemployment problem." And then he proceeded to lay the blame entirely on the "winding down" of the Vietnam War and the release of 2 million members of the Armed Services and cutbacks in defense installations.

Even if the President is correct in assessing the blame, an assessment from which many economists differ, the question remains: What does he intend to do about jobless men and women?

His total program, directly affecting the unemployed, was in advocating a 10 percent tax break to business in the purchase of new plants and equipment. He calls this a Job Development Credit.

How many jobs will this approach actually create? Certainly not the hundreds of thousands that some Administration spokesmen so arbitrarily claim.

They fail to take into consideration the fact that new plants frequently mean automated plants and fewer jobs. Also, with U.S. industry operating at only about 70 percent of capacity, there is less likelihood of new investments in this field.

Some jobs will result from the $1 billion emergency employment legislation passed by Congress. However, the President signed this reluctantly after vetoing an earlier bill that would have meant thousands of jobs then.

His stress on increased productivity is hardly the answer. This means greater production with less man-hours of work. Now, this may be a healthy thing for the economy as a whole but even a poor mathematician can see that it will not improve the unemployment situation.

Then there is the Nixon order calling for a 5 percent cutback in federal employment. This will slash some 100,000 jobs.

THAT UNEMPLOYMENT has reached dangerous proportions, there is little question. The latest Labor Dept. report on the employment situation shows that in September unemployment was 6 percent of the work force.

Two of the latest reports on the unemployment situation are not likely to provide any comfort, either. These are:

The unemployment rate for poverty neighborhoods rose in the third quarter—July, August and September—to 10.4 percent overall and for Negroes to 14.1 percent.

Nearly 320,000 Vietnam Era veterans were unemployed during the third quarter, about the same as the second quarter level but 110,000 greater than a year ago.

To many observers it appears that whereas wage-frozen workers are carrying an unfair burden under the New Economic Program, the full brunt of it is being carried by the 5 million unemployed workers.

ECONOMIC POLICIES of Pres. Nixon provide little hope of holding down medical costs, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He is interviewed by Judith Randal of the Washington Evening Star and Jerome Brazda of the Washington Report on Medicine & Health. The program is aired Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

Labor Board Is Tagged With Unfair Practice

Members of the National Labor Relations Board now know how it feels to be found guilty of unfair labor practices. A hearing officer has recommended that Chairman Edward B. Miller and four fellow members be ordered to bargain with a union.

Labor Dept. Examiner John S. Patton acted on a complaint filed by the NLRB Professional Association, which represents most of the board's staff lawyers—157 of 186.

Patton ruled after hearings that it was a legitimate management prerogative for the board to establish new rules for handling cases, as it did after Miller became chairman in 1969. But it was not proper for the board to refuse to bargain with the association on the time allotted for processing cases, the examiner held.

The dispute will go to Assistant Labor Sec. William J. Usery for a final ruling, as Presidential Executive Order 11491 provides. Both sides have until Nov. 1 to file exceptions, and Usery is expected to rule about a month after that.

Patton recommended that Usery order the NLRB to stop refusing to consult or negotiate with the association, to stop changing time schedules unilaterally, to post notices of its intent to comply and to notify the assistant labor secretary, in writing, of the steps it must take to comply with the order.

Massachusetts Labor Demands Import Curbs

Boston—Delegates to the 14th annual Massachusetts AFL-CIO convention interrupted business sessions to march through the downtown area protesting the flood of cheap imports which have cost hundreds of thousands of American jobs.

Nearly all 1,200 delegates participated in the march, bearing placards urging the federal government to impose meaningful curbs on imports.

State Federation Vice Pres. Joseph Salerno, who is New England director of the Clothing Workers, warned delegates that unless Congress establishes controls to halt the export of American jobs, capital, and technology, "unemployment will rise and America will become a second-rate nation."

A five-point program to combat the "wholesale slaughter of American jobs" was adopted by delegates. It calls for U.S. regulation of investments in foreign operations, a government tax on "runaway" firms, government regulation of foreign license and patent arrangements, international fair labor standards for world trade, and limitations on imports that are significantly displacing American production and jobs.

All 35 incumbent officers were re-elected including the top four officials of the state federation who were elected by acclamation. They are: Pres. Salvatore Camelio, Sec.-Treas. James P. Loughlin and Executive Vice Presidents Joseph A. Sullivan and Daniel F. Murray.

The first resolution adopted by the delegates called on Pres. Nixon to make his wage-price freeze equitable, and this resolution served as a keynote to the convention.

The economic policies of the Nixon Administration were the subject of almost every convention speech, including that of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) who accused the Administration of taking American industry down a dead-end street.

"It has succeeded in doing what no foreign power has ever come close to achieving," Kennedy said. "It has stalled the national economy for two-and-a-half years."

Charging that the Administration's so-called "job-investment tax credit" is "tilted astronomically in favor of corporate wealth," he described the new wage-price policy as a package that puts burdens on the worker and gives benefits to the rich.

"The Administration continues to ask workers to sacrifice everything and corporations to sacrifice nothing," Kennedy charged.

Sen. Edward W. Brooke (R-Mass.) told delegates that Congress would have to make certain that the sacrifices demanded by economic controls be borne equally by all Americans.

Other speakers included COPE Director Al Barkan.

Scholarship awards totaling $18,000 were presented to 46 high school students at the convention. Among these were two $1,000 scholarships given each year by the state central body—the John F. Kennedy Memorial Scholarship and the Francis E. Lavigne Memorial Award. Another $1,000 scholarship, the John F. Tracy Award, is presented by the Bricklayers.

Convention Fee Approved in NewHampshire

Nashua, N.H.—More than 200 delegates to the 1971 New Hampshire AFL-CIO convention approved a registration fee for all future annual conventions and elected officers of the state federation.

Purpose of the $10 registration fee per delegate is to help meet ever-increasing convention costs, explained Sec.-Treas. Saverio Giambalvo, who was re-elected along with state central body Pres. Thomas Pitarys and Executive Vice Pres. Joseph Moriarty.

Eleven incumbent members of the federation's executive board were re-elected, and seven new board members were chosen. They are:

District 1, Gaston Bouchard; District 2, Lois Ferdette; District 3, Lawrence Burnash; District 4, Richard Hammond; District 7, Roland Faucher and Ralph Watts, and District 9, Charles Hildreth.

Delegates condemned Pres. Nixon's wage-price freeze as inequitable and denounced the Administration's policies on unemployment. One resolution adopted said that the 10-percent import surcharge is not the answer to the import problem.

Another resolution backed the AFL-CIO's fight for National Health Security.

High Cost of 'Right-to-Work' Laws:

Open-Shop States Falling Further Behind in Income

"Right-to-work" laws continue to slow down growth in states where the open shop is compulsory, the latest government figures demonstrate dramatically.

The U.S. Dept. of Commerce reported for the year ended in August 1971 that in per capita personal income, only one of the 19 R-T-W states ranks above the national average—$3,921. Nevada, where the strongly organized entertainment industry helps boost the state average, is and has been for some years the only exception.

Residents of the other open-shop states are in general falling farther behind the parade in wages and other forms of income, the Commerce Dept. tables show. Five R-T-W bastions are firmly anchored at the bottom of the personal income list—North Dakota, South Carolina, Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi.

Per capita income in states above the national average ranges from a high of $5,387 a year in the District of Columbia to a point just above the national average—$3,972 for Ohio, $3,927 for Pennsylvania.

The harmful effects of R-T-W are not restricted to worker earnings, other government figures show. States where legal barriers prevent free bargaining between employers and employes also lag behind the rest of the country in hourly wage rates for production workers, and in per pupil funding of public education.

Only three of the 19 R-T-W states are above the national average in hourly wages of production workers—Nevada, Iowa, Utah. As in the case of per capita income, the five states at the bottom of the Labor Dept.'s wage-rate list are R-T-W states.

The U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare reported for 1969 that only one open-shop state—Iowa—was above the national average for per pupil expenditures in its public school system. $890 per year as against $783.

Alabama, an open shop state since 1953, had the lowest per-pupil spending rate in the nation—$438—with Mississippi only slightly above it in rank at $476.

The Commerce Dept. listing shows that of all R-T-W states, North Dakota experienced the greatest loss in income per resident. It was only $29 below the national average in 1948, but by 1970 it had fallen to an all-time low mark of $926 below the average, or $2,995.

Despite some growth by R-T-W states in per capita income during the vast national expansion of the past two decades, the source said, their growth has been slower than that of other states, with this result: of the seven states which were above the national average before they adopted their R-T-W laws, six are now below it.

Here is a state-by-state analysis of per capita income in compulsory-open-shop states for selected years.

ALABAMA was $680 below the national average when its "work" law was passed in 1953. By 1970 it was $1,068 below, a drop of $388.

ARIZONA was $156 below the national average income a year after its R-T-W law was passed in 1947. By 1970 it was $330 below, a loss of $174.

ARKANSAS was $555 below the national average in 1948, a year after the law was passed. By 1970 it was $1,130 below—down $575.

FLORIDA enacted a right-to-work law in 1944. By 1948 it was $250 below the national average and by 1970, $279 below—a loss of $29 in relation to the average.

IOWA was $160 above the average in 1948 but by 1970 it was $233 below—a drop of $393.

KANSAS passed its R-T-W law in 1958, when it was $5 above the average. In 1970 it was $98 below, a loss of $103.

MISSISSIPPI was $877 below the national income average in 1954, when it passed its law. In 1970 it was $1,346 below—a slippage of $469.

NEBRASKA was $79 above the average in 1948 and by 1970 was $170 below—a loss of $249.

NEVADA is the only "right-to-work" state that is consistently above the national average. It was $597 above in 1951, when its law was put on the books. By 1970 it was $641 above.

State Job Injury Laws Held Outdated, Unfair

Chicago—A Wisconsin trade unionist who has spent most of his career working for passage and improvement of workmen's compensation legislation stressed the need for national standards in the field as he testified before a federal panel here.

"I submit that the record shows that the states are not prepared to render equal justice to injured workers who serve all of us in the nation," J. F. Friedrick, former president of the Milwaukee County Labor Council, told the National Commission on State Workmen's Compensation Laws.

The commission, established by the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1970, is conducting a comprehensive study and evaluation of state workmen's compensation laws to determine whether they are providing an adequate, prompt and equitable system of compensation.

Friedrick told the commission that present laws simply do not meet the test of equity and that the current attitude is "not how fairly and justly we can treat the injured worker, but rather how little we can get away with."

As an example of the inequality of the various state laws, he contrasted workmen's compensation benefits in New York and New Jersey.

In New York, provisions call for a benefit of $24,960 for loss of an arm, while in New Jersey, it is only $12,000.

"I am aware of the fact that the cry of 'states rights' will be raised. But I am also aware that some who raise the cry of 'states rights' do so in an effort to continue 'states wrongs.'"

Friedrick, now 77, suggested that weekly compensation in a national law shoud be set no lower than the average wage of the workers covered, and that below that maximum, wage losses be compensated at 100 percent.

The national commission is conducting hearings in six major cities, including Washington, D.C., where the AFL-CIO will present its views.

The federation's social security director, Bert Seidman, has urged all affiliated unions and state and local central bodies to present their views to the commission which will report its findings and recommendations to the President and Congress by next Aug. 1.

Rubber Workers Sign Pact for Health Study

Akron—The Rubber Workers signed a three-way agreement for on-the-job environmental health studies covering 21,000 workers at Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. The studies will be conducted by the University of North Carolina School of Public Health.

This is the second such agreement negotiated by the URW this year. The earlier epidemiological study agreement was with B. F. Goodrich Co. and the Harvard University School of Public Health.

The health study agreements are the outgrowth of the joint occupational health program negotiated by the URW with the five major U.S. rubber companies last year. The other three big rubber firms are expected to sign similar health study agreements shortly, the union said.

Goodyear will pay the full cost of the program, estimated at $180,000 the first year and $260,000 the second year. It will be financed by company contributions of a half-cent an hour for each worker.

Initially, health researchers will evaluate health and disease patterns of production and maintenance workers based on death certificates, social security data, company health records and union information. The findings will be used to develop safety standards at the Goodyear plants.

The health study program covers Goodyear plants in 15 cities across the country. They are Akron, St. Marys and Marysville, Ohio; Gadsden, Ala.; Los Angeles; Jackson, Mich.; Lincoln, Neb.; Windsor, Vt.; New Bedford, Mass.; Topeka, Kan.; North Chicago; Danville, Va.; Madisonville, Ky.; Union Ctiy, Tenn., and Sun Prairie, Wis.

Beckstead Heads Union:

Telegraph Workers To Fight Job Loss

Denver—The Telegraph Workers voted at their convention to finance a vigorous campaign to halt loss of jobs in their industry and elected new top officers to lead the fight.

Delegates from seven union divisions in the United States and Canada allocated funds to prevent the diversion of Western Union telegraph work to subsidiaries of the corporation, and to halt the "contracting-out and subcontracting of all facets" of the telegrapher's work.

"We must intensify our fight to save members' jobs," said Dan J. Beckstead of Washington, D.C., the new international UTW president. "If we don't, there'll be few, if any, jobs left."

Beckstead was the only nominee for the president's post vacated by E. L. Hageman, who retired after eight years in office. The new secretary-treasurer is T. T. "Ted" Freeman of Washington, D.C., who won election as successor to John T. Dowling. Dowling retired after serving some 18 years.

Hageman and Dowling were given a standing vote of appreciation by the convention for their leadership, including their work during the recent 57-day strike against Western Union. The strikers returned to work in July with wage increases totaling 19 percent over two years, wage equalization and other benefits in contracts union officers called "the best we've ever negotiated."

The delegates authorized the officers to put a 10-cent monthly per capita increase into effect as soon as the Nixon freeze is lifted. The money will be used for increased operating expenses.

To replenish union funds nearly depleted during the Western Union strike, delegates to a separate convention of that division voted to raise monthly per capita payments of division members from $1.75 to $3.25, subject to a membership referendum and wage board approval. They agreed also to allocate some of the increased income to division expenses.

Beckstead, the incoming president, formerly served as national vice president. Elected to his old post was R. C. Brockert, former president of the Western Union division's Washington, D.C., local.

Freeman formerly was national secretary-treasurer of the division. J. A. Marquardt of Seattle, former president of the Western Union division in Seattle, won a three-way race for Freeman's former office.

International officers are elected for four-year terms; national division officers for two-year terms.

In other international convention action, the delegates took two steps demonstrating their objection to the Nixon wage freeze. They disapproved the Administration's interference with wages as "obviously slanted in favor of large corporations." Also they voted that officers should "express to the President our disapproval of the 10 percent surcharge" on products of "our Canadian brothers."

They added: "Unlike other countries, imports from Canada are high in quality and comparable in price to our own goods."

The union's name was changed in 1968 from Commercial Telegraphers to United Telegraph Workers. It represents members in Associated Press, United Press International, Western Union, Radio Officers Union, Canadian Press, Canadian National and Canadian Pacific divisions.

LABOR AND FOREIGN POLICY in the '70s was the subject of a two-day conference at the American Institute for Free Labor Development center in Front Royal, Va. U.S. Defeat in UN Tied To Nixon China Policy the UN the Republic of China, a founding member, reflects the diminishing confidence placed by an increasing number of countries in the credibility and strength of U.S. foreign policy which has, in recent months, been geared with mounting frequency, to a course of appeasement especially in such pivotal areas as the Asian mainland, Central Europe and the Middle East.

"The spectacle of the President's personal representative in Peking making overtures to the representative of Red China at a time when the United States was supposed to be supporting the Nationalist Chinese in the UN was not lost on many of the smaller nations who must of necessity look to the bigger powers for their security.

"On Aug. 10, 1971, the AFL-CIO Executive Council, in considering Pres. Nixon's newest China policy, warned: 'Let none forget the lessons of the experience of the League of Nations which was doomed when it turned its back on its basic aims and, in the name of being "realistic," betrayed Ethiopia to the Fascist aggressor.' Unfortunately, this timely warning was not heeded.

"The heavy UN vote providing for the simultaneous expulsion of the Republic of China and the placement of the Mao Tse-tung regime on the Security Council of the United Nations has dealt a fatal blow to the UN as an instrument of international harmony, peace, and freedom.

"In order to curry favor with a Communist power, which has been and still remains branded by the UN as an aggressor, the majority of the General Assembly voted to expel a loyal member and betray the principles which are supposed to guide the United Nations.

"The confidence of the American people in this world body has been gravely damaged. U.S. Ambassador to the UN, George Bush, has appropriately characterized this development as a 'moment of infamy.'

"The pro-Peking vote cast by sundry government representatives in the UN has revealed a most dangerous contempt for the aims and aspirations of the United Nations Charter. This action can only foster among the peoples of the world an attitude of paralyzing distrust in the UN which had once inspired them with hope for a world free from war, tyranny and poverty."

CORRECTION

The International Election & Referendum Committee of the Newspaper Guild has certified the reelection of Glen Ogilvie of Toronto as Canadian regional vice president in a contest with James Young of Vancouver-New Westminster, formerly an at-large vice president. The AFL-CIO News mistakenly reported Ogilvie's defeat.

Safeguards Urged Against Tanker Leaks

An urgent plea to members of the Senate Commerce Committee to approve a bill designed to protect America's sea lanes and harbors from pollution and poison from oil tanker accidents has been made by Pres. Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers.

Calhoon said MEBA members "support this bill because our experience on the high seas and in the harbors, ports and rivers of the world have convinced us that we cannot afford the luxury of delay in seeking to protect the well-being of our environment. . . ."

"We cannot continue to play a game of 'petroleum roulette' in which a single mischance, or an accident, or a unique twist of fate can cause permanent damage to our environment."

The bill would require all tanker ships to meet high standards of safety—both in terms of controls and of prevention of leakage of cargoes—before they could enter American waters.

Calhoon said the race for greater tanker capacity must not continue without making equal efforts to provide regulation and inspection.

Activities Schedule For Studies Center

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center has scheduled nine institutes for November and December, including three special seminars on occupational safety and health.

On the calendar are:

Labor Law (at University of California, Berkeley) Nov. 15-19.

Institute for Building Trades Business Agents, Nov. 29-Dec. 3.

Negotiated Fringe Benefits & Federal Social Programs, Nov. 29-Dec. 3.

Critical Problems in State Government, Dec. 6-10.

Unions in American Society in the Next Decade, Dec. 6-10.

Health Care in the United States, Dec. 13-17.

The occupational safety institutes will be at Cornell University, Ithaca, Nov. 30-Dec. 3; University of Missouri, Columbia, Dec. 6-10, and University of California, Berkeley, Dec. 13-16.

Foreign Affairs Forum Stresses Role of Labor

Front Royal, Va.—Labor's involvement in international affairs received special attention at a conference on Labor and Foreign Policy in the '70's held at the American Institute for Free Labor Development's training facility here.

With more than 50 participants from 24 unions and international trade secretariats in attendance, the conferees examined the serious questions concerning the forces opposed to free trade unionism, the sharp increase of multinational conglomerates, the implication of the rapidly growing labor forces in developing countries and the foreign policy issues that will affect the outcome of next year's domestic elections.

Co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Departments of International Affairs and Education, AIFLD and Georgetown University's International Labor Program, the conference attracted the AFL-CIO's leading internationalists as guest speakers.

They were: AFL-CIO Economist Elizabeth Jager; AIFLD Executive Director William C. Doherty; Morris Paladino, director of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, and Irving Brown, executive director of the African-American Labor Council. Among other speakers were Dr. Fritz Kraemer, strategic analyst for the Army, author Ben Wattenburg and Roy Godson of Georgetown University.

"This represents the first of what we hope to be a continuing series of conferences designed to broaden the understanding of American trade unionists about international issues which affect the nation's future and their own lives as well," said AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis as he opened the two-day meeting.

Keynoting the conference, Director Jay Lovestone of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs outlined the historical and practical basis underlying the federation's international policies. At one point in his presentation, he stressed that "labor's foreign policy aims are peace, freedom and social justice."

"It is because of these goals that we say that Nixon's concessions to Moscow and Red China are wrong," he declared.

The crucial issues arising from the current efforts toward economic development in the developing countries and their effect on the American worker were highlighted by several of the speakers.

Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the AFL-CIO International Affairs Committee, said he was glad that the conference was only a beginning because "United States local union leaders and rank-and-filers know precious little about world affairs."

Beirne closed the conference with a warning to participants that "the battle with communism will continue through our lifetimes. At stake is whether or not we will have societies in which people are free to speak out and protect themselves and to freely negotiate contracts."

The Fire Fighters signed a one-year Labor Dept. contract to recruit and train 1,200 Vietnam-era veterans from minority groups in 12 urban areas.

IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan said the union was gratified that the Labor Dept. has accepted its proposal to prepare qualified candidates as Fire Fighters.

"We feel this project will go a long way toward increasing minority representation in the fire service," he said, and at the same time help maintain vital professional standards while providing first-class protection in the urban areas.

The contract carries a $425,000 Labor Dept. grant. Areas tentatively selected for the project are Boston, Los Angeles, Los Angeles County, Buffalo, Milwaukee, Jacksonville, Fla., Chicago, Detroit, Tacoma, Wash., Seattle, Oakland, Calif., and Washington, D.C.

Approximately 100 candidates will be recruited in each of the 12 areas.

The union will set up a recruiting program, develop a course of instruction and help candidates meet all entrance requirements. The instructional program will range from 20 to 60 hours, with Fire Fighters serving as instructors.

The IAFF will also prepare a training guide for use in extending the program to other cities in the future, the Labor Dept. said.

Ideology Questioned:

Intense Study Urged On Court Nominees

The Senate has "a very heavy responsibility" to examine the qualifications of Pres. Nixon's two nominees for the Supreme Court, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany said the AFL-CIO will also make its own "careful and dispassionate study" of the records of William H. Rehnquist and Lewis F. Powell, Jr., the President's surprise, last-minute choices for the two court vacancies.

"On the face of it," Meany suggested, "these appointments seem to be part and parcel of the Administration's effort to pack the court with ultra-conservatives who subscribe to the President's narrow views on human rights and civil rights."

The Senate, Meany said, should confirm the appointments only if it finds that the ideology of the nominees "conforms to that of the Constitution rather than that of the President."

Rehnquist, a Goldwater Republican who has been described as intellectually brilliant, is an assistant attorney general in the Justice Dept. He has defended wiretapping and electronic surveillance, lobbied unsuccessfully for Senate confirmation of Nixon's controversial nominations of Judges Clement F. Haynsworth and G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court, and asserted that federal employes have no right to publicly oppose Administration policies.

Powell, a prominent Richmond, Va., lawyer, is a former president of the American Bar Association whose appointment would fulfill Nixon's promise to name a southern conservative to the Supreme Court.

Ironically, it was a threatened confrontation with the Bar Association that led to the unexpected appointments of Powell and Rehnquist.

For weeks, names of potential court nominees had been floated by Administration sources to test public and congressional reaction. Early in the game, a conservative Virginia congressman best known for his fight to block all civil rights legislation, asked that his name be withdrawn from consideration—and the White House obliged.

Finally, a list of six persons under consideration was leaked to the press and it quickly became known that the White House had asked the American Bar Association's federal judiciary committee to review and clear the names of Herschel L. Friday of Little Rock, Ark., and Los Angeles Judge Mildred L. Lillie, who was expected to be the first woman named to the Supreme Court.

This was in accordance with the agreement Attorney Gen. John N. Mitchell had made last year to consult with the Bar Association before recommending Supreme Court appointments to the President.

Most of the members of the ABA committee are considered conservatives. But they were widely reported to have been dismayed by the President's top choices.

By a near-unanimous vote, they termed Mrs. Lillie unqualified. On a closer ballot, they refused to approve the nomination of Friday—a municipal bond lawyer with segregationist ties, whose law firm had been branded by the Arkansas State AFL-CIO as notorious for union-busting activities on behalf of its employer clients.

Administration officials were reported furious when word of the Bar Association's disapproval became known. And minutes after the President announced his new appointments, the White House released a letter from Mitchell informing the Bar Association that the prior consultation agreement was being canceled. The Administration would no longer ask the association to endorse its choices before the appointments were made.

Rehnquist and Powell are the fifth and sixth nominations to the Supreme Court that Nixon has submitted to the Senate. Of his four earlier nominees, two were confirmed and two were rejected.

Safety Council Elects Connelly Of Carpenters

Chicago—Paul H. Connelly, safety director of the Carpenters, was elected vice president for labor on the National Safety Council. He succeeds Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea of the Brewery Workers, who did not seek re-election.

Connelly was chosen at the week-long session of the NSC's Labor Conference.

The conference focused on the implementation of the new Occupational Safety & Health Act, calling on the AFL-CIO and international unions to expand training programs that would broaden workers' understanding of the law.

Edward J. Legan succeeded Thomas A. Dillon as chairman of the Labor Conference. Legan, an international representative with the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, was formerly vice chairman. Taking over that post is William McCullough of the Canadian Union of Public Employes, Toronto.

Labor Asks Hodgson To Protect BLS Role

"sort of mixed," while Hodgson had said they were "favorable, hopeful" and "indeed, heartening."

As far as reorganization goes, Meany was referring to the departure of chief BLS economist, Peter Henle, who the Labor Dept. said had asked for a leave of absence, and the shift of Goldstein from his job of interpreting jobs figures.

Goldstein headed the Office of Manpower & Employment Statistics, which is being split. He is being assigned to deal with long-range statistical analysis, and an Office of Data Analysis is being established to interpret such key indicators as the Consumer Price Index, productivity figures and unemployment reports.

Most recently, the BLS announced suspension of its quarterly reports on unemployment in the nation's urban poverty centers until "sometime in 1973."

BLS officials denied that the cancelation was politically motivated, stating that it was necessary to incorporate data gathered in the 1970 decennial census to make the quarterly report reliable. Since the series began, it has been based on the 1960 census.

In his letter to Hodgson, Meany noted that the basic statistics published by the BLS are used by "labor and management in collective bargaining agreements and in business contracts.

"This information, is also used by other government agencies and by the public at large in following economic trends."

He said that up to now both business and labor have had "confidence in the integrity of this agency's work."

"It would be a real tragedy if this confidence were to be destroyed, and it would be destroyed if the BLS and the vital information it collects, interprets and publishes became political propaganda or became suspect as such."

Meany said Hodgson should act to reverse this trend "in order that the integrity of the BLS be protected from even the suspicion of political manipulation."

Meanwhile, charges continued to mount in Congress that the Administration is attempting to stifle unfavorable reports on the economy.

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, said he would call Director George Shultz of the Office of Management & Budget as a witness in a committee investigation into the BLS shakeup and the elimination of press briefings.

He said he would ask Shultz to explain why the poverty-area unemployment figures are being discontinued.

"One may well wonder whether this is another step by this Administration to eliminate poverty by dropping the word from the dictionary," Proxmire declared.

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) charged that the BLS shakeup amounts to "tampering" with the agency "to assure that policy analysts, rather than statistical analysts, will be in the highly sensitive job of reporting unemployment statistics."

"The fact is," Humphrey said on the Senate floor, "that this temporary discontinuance (of urban poverty reports) indicates that the Nixon Administration is unwilling to announce anything but rosy economic news in the election year of 1972."

He said the decision to suspend the poverty series is "discriminatory against the poor, against blacks, and against other minority groups in our nation.

"We need to know what the unemployment figures are—particularly in the urban poverty areas where the jobless rates run so high—so we can target our efforts for economic recovery."

"We need to know if programs to improve conditions under which people live are working," Humphrey said.

Senate Unit Votes Strong Powers For Equal Employment Agency

The Senate Labor Committee voted strong bipartisan endorsement of a bill giving the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission the enforcement power and jurisdiction it needs to combat job discrimination.

After overwhelmingly rejecting a toothless substitute bill backed by the Administration and employer organizations, the committee unanimously reported the measure sponsored by its chairman, Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and backed by labor and civil rights groups.

It would give the EEOC power to issue "cease-and-desist" orders directing employers, unions or employment agencies to remedy illegal job discrimination. Its powers and enforcement procedure would be similar to those of the National Labor Relations Board in unfair labor practices cases.

It would expand coverage of the basic law—a part of the 1964 Civil Rights Act—barring job discrimination based on race, religion, national origin and sex.

And it would take a big step to end the confusion and overlapping of jurisdiction by shifting most other government fair employment programs to the EEOC. The Labor Dept.'s Office of Federal Contract Compliance would be moved into the EEOC operation, and the agency would be given the power now reserved to the Justice Dept. to bring suits attacking "patterns" of discrimination.

Senate leaders reportedly plan to call up the legislation by mid-November. And if the Senate approves the bill—as it did a similar measure last year—a House-Senate conference committee will be faced with the task of trying to reconcile two very different bills.

The House Labor Committee had approved a bill similar to the Senate committee measure. But the House, in mid-September, voted by a narrow 202-197 margin to substitute the Administration-Chamber of Commerce bill.

The House-passed legislation would make no change in the EEOC jurisdiction, leaving the government's anti-discrimination programs divided and sometimes contradictory. And it would deny the EEOC power to remedy job discrimination. If the agency were unable to obtain voluntary compliance, it would have to bring suit in federal district court—the lowest step in the judiciary system.

In another area, the Senate Finance Committee began voting on provisions of the House-passed tax bill, which includes Administration proposals giving a multi-billion dollar windfall to business.

The Senate panel approved the House-passed 7 percent investment tax credit—in effect a federal subsidy to business on the price it pays for equipment and machinery.

It did, however, vote to expand somewhat the "buy American" provision in the House version. The House bill provided that the investment tax credit would apply only to American-built equipment so long as the 10 percent import surcharge remains in effect.

The Senate panel voted to give the President discretionary authority to deny the investment credit to imported equipment even after the surcharge is lifted.

Unions Push Drive To Monitor Rates

Prices are continuing to rise—both legally and illegally—while workers' pay and benefits are strictly frozen, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged in testimony presented at Senate hearings on economic stabilization legislation.

That's one big reason, Meany said, why workers and consumers have no confidence in the fairness of the Nixon Administration's control program. And it's one of many reasons why the AFL-CIO opposes the Administration bill to broaden the President's powers and extend them until April 30, 1973—a full year beyond the expiration date of the present law.

Instead, Meany urged, Congress should write into the present law a firm assurance of "equality of sacrifice" so that public confidence in the fairness of the stabilization program can be restored.

Meanwhile, the House Banking Committee, working on the Administration's bill, voted tentatively to require the Pay Board to approve retroactively wage increases frozen during the 90-day period starting Aug. 16.

The action came as the Pay Board met on the issues of previously negotiated wage increases caught in the freeze and deferred pay under union contracts, amid indications that public and industry members were opposed to validation of these contracts.

Meany's comments were made as organized labor mounted a nationwide effort to monitor adherence to the price freeze and any controls developed for Phase II of the stabilization program. The action, being coordinated by the federation's Dept. of Community

Area Jobless Rates Reach 10-Year High

The number of the nation's major urban areas with substantial unemployment jumped to 65 in October—the highest number to be so classified in 10 years, the Labor Dept. reported.

The Labor Dept. defines "substantial" unemployment as a rate of 6 percent or more, with that level of joblessness expected to continue for at least two more months.

Three of the nation's 150 major labor markets were added to the substantial list in October and two others were removed.

The 65 major areas with unemployment of 6 percent or more represented the highest number since October 1961, when there were 68.

During October 1970, only 38 areas showed substantial unemployment while only five of the major job centers were in that category two years ago.

AFL-CIO Asks Restoration of Foreign Aid

The United States can't "run away from its world responsibilities," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned in a statement calling on Congress to keep the foreign aid program alive.

A stunning 41-27 Senate vote defeated a much-amended foreign aid bill and created what Meany termed an "intolerable" crisis.

Unless Congress acts quickly, all spending authority for aid programs will expire Nov. 15 and the world's richest and most powerful nation will have retreated into a shell of isolationism.

Both military aid to America's allies and economic aid to the have-not nations of the world would be abruptly cut off; humanitarian assistance to refugees, children and

Behind-the-Scene Tactics:

Blue Cross Linked To Health Bill Foes

The AFL-CIO has warned its affiliates to beware of efforts by the insurance industry and Blue Cross to undermine organized labor's campaign for passage of National Health Security.

At the same time, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) revealed a plan by Blue Cross for an extensive lobbying effort in Congress to assure that Blue Cross will have a role in financing any national health insurance program. Kennedy accused Blue Cross of wasting its subscribers' health insurance money in the lobbying effort.

Blue Cross and the insurance industry have been working behind the scenes at state federation convention to weaken labor's front on the Health Security campaign, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman disclosed.

He reported these efforts were uncovered in Colorado and South Carolina, although both state bodies overwhelmingly came out in support of the Health Security program.

In Colorado, a resolution was brought to the floor calling for amendments in the Kennedy-Griffiths Health Security bill to include provisions of the insurance industry measure.

The resolution read in part: "Under no condition do we feel the federal government should replace private enterprise such as Blue Cross-Blue Shield or the insurance industry in providing national health benefits. . . ."

That resolution was tabled and the Colorado delegates unanimously adopted one that stressed: "Qualified health care is a basic universal necessity and should not be left solely to the self-interest groups such as doctors, the health insurance industry and others...."

While no alternative resolution to Health Security was introduced at the South Carolina convention, a Blue Cross representative was overheard in conversations with delegates attacking the Kennedy-Griffiths health care measure.

The industry representative was at the convention to promote Blue Cross and Blue Shield coverage in union-negotiated contracts.

Clement D. Dowler, southern area COPE director, noted however,

Local Issues Dominate In 'Off-Year' Elections

The election of a Democratic governor in Kentucky, victory for a labor-backed independent candidate in Virginia and a black-white gubernatorial contest in Mississippi remarkably free of racial hostility were among the highlights of the "off-year" elections held Nov. 2.

A series of mayoralty elections, centering on local issues and personalities, produced the usual mixed results. The Republican candidate for mayor of Cleveland won an upset victory in a three-way race, but most other large cities stayed with the party in control or with incumbents in non-partisan elections. A labor-backed reform candidate in Jersey City defeated 17 opponents to fill out the term of the imprisoned former mayor.

The only congressional contest—in the Pittsburgh area—saw the election of a moderate Republican, H. J. Heinz III, to fill out the term of his moderate Republican predecessor, the late Robert J. Corbett.

Industry Profits Surge 11.6% in Third Quarter

Corporation profits continued to climb during the third quarter of 1971, a survey of 537 leading firms disclosed.

Total after-tax earnings of the companies tallied by the Wall Street Journal were up 11.6 percent from the same July through September period of 1970. This followed a second quarter in which profits were 10.3 percent above the comparable period the previous year.

The overall gain was posted despite a sharp slump in earnings for the steel, aluminum and copper industries. Thirteen steel manufacturers, in fact, reported losses for the quarter as customers used up inventories stockpiled against the possibility of a strike.

Auto manufacturers, airlines, building material firms, department stores, railroads and utilities were among the major industries listing above-average gains.

The President's wage-price freeze came midway in the quarter. While companies affected weren't able to raise their prices after mid-August, they were able, however, to pocket any wage and benefit increases that came due after the freeze.

UNION-MADE PRODUCTS attract large crowds at the second Union-Industries Show of the Canadian Labor Congress at London, Ont. More than 100 exhibitors participated in the five-day show sponsored by the CLC Union Label Trades Dept. It had an attendance of 89,288 persons.

1971 Wage Settlements Show Downward Trend

Major collective bargaining agreements negotiated during the first nine months of 1971 provided pay raises averaging 8 percent a year over the life of the contract, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Including the value of fringe benefits—but not of cost-of-living escalator clauses—the average is raised to 8.4 percent.

Both figures were down somewhat from the 1970 calendar year, when wage increases averaged 8.9 percent over the contract term and the pay-benefit package averaged 9.1 percent.

Most contracts provided higher increases during the first year of the agreement. Thus the first-year wage increase averaged 11.8 percent in new contracts, virtually the same as the 11.9 percent average the previous year. And the first-year combined wage and benefit package averaged 12.8 percent, compared with 13.1 percent for 1970 contracts.

The mid-August wage-price freeze was not a factor in the contract settlements, the BLS noted, since the contracts negotiated after the freeze affected only 36,000 of the 2.8 million workers covered by the agreements surveyed.

The BLS noted that 1971 settlements saw the reintroduction of cost-of-living clauses in several major industries which had previously abandoned them, and the adoption of escalator clauses in other companies for the first time.

On wage rates alone, the annual rate of increase over the life of the contract was 7.1 percent for agreements with escalator clauses and 9.3 percent for contracts without cost-of-living protection.

In the construction industry, where none of the contracts surveyed included escalator clauses, the life of the contract average increase was 11.7 percent, as compared with 14.9 percent the previous year. For first-year increases, the 1971 average of 13.5 percent compared with 17.6 percent in 1970.

The BLS survey for all industries covered settlements affecting 1,000 or more workers in tallying wage rate changes and settlements affecting 5,000 or more workers in computing the wage and fringe benefit package.

Pamphlet Shatters Teen-Wage Myths

A new AFL-CIO pamphlet, "The Teen-Wage Fiction," shatters the myths of the Nixon Administration's argument for a sub-minimum wage for teenage workers.

Congress is now considering a package of amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act that would boost the minimum wage to $2 an hour and extend coverage to millions more workers. The Administration proposal would freeze the minimum wage for most teenagers at $1.60 an hour.

The four-page pamphlet is available free in quantity from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., NW, Wash., D.C. 20006.

Criticism Mounting On Rehnquist's Views

Criticism of Pres. Nixon's nomination of William H. Rehnquist to the Supreme Court continued to surface as the Senate Judiciary Committee opened confirmation hearings.

Rehnquist, currently an assistant attorney general in the Justice Dept., is on public record with a series of hard-line, ultra-conservative statements and writings—ranging from opposition to public accommodation laws as an invasion of the freedom of businessmen in selecting their customers, to defense of government wiretapping and surveillance and an assertion that the government has the right to fire federal employes who express public dissent from Administration policies.

These and similar views led a coalition of civil rights, religious, civic and labor groups to announce its opposition to the nomination. The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, which includes the AFL-CIO, said it will testify against confirmation at the Senate hearings.

Rehnquist, himself, is on record as asserting that the Senate should consider the "judicial philosophy" of Supreme Court nominees—not just their legal qualifications.

Under questioning at the Senate hearings, however, he toned down his own judicial philosophy and partially backtracked from some of his earlier statements.

Asked whether he still opposes public accommodations laws which prohibit businesses from refusing service to persons because of race, he told the committee: "I think probably not."

There was no sign of opposition to Pres. Nixon's other nominee for the Supreme Court—Virginia attorney Lewis F. Powell, Jr., a former president of the American Bar Association.

The Bar Association's Committee on the Judiciary, which earlier had branded as unqualified two persons the White House had indicated would be appointed, unanimously gave its highest rating to Powell. But three of its members expressed reservations about Rehnquist—agreeing that he was "qualified" but unwilling to join in a strong endorsement.

Metal Trades Trounce NAGE In Norfolk Vote

Norfolk, Va.—Blue-collar workers at the Norfolk Naval Shipyard voted by a margin of more than 2 to 1 to retain the Tidewater Virginia Federal Employes Metal Trades Council, AFL-CIO, as their collective bargaining representative with the Navy.

The vote was 3,350 for the Metal Trades Council to 1,520 for the unaffiliated National Association of Government Employes with 120 votes for no union. The results of the balloting, which was held in May, were not announced until this week.

The vote ended an attempted raid that began two years ago. The Labor Dept. threw out the results of a 1969 election because it found that NAGE had improperly offered the shipyard employes "free" insurance in a move to influence voting.

The Norfolk Metal Trades Council, made up of 20 AFL-CIO unions, had held bargaining rights covering the shipyard's 6,400 wage-board employes for six years when the raid began. NAGE has frequently tried to disrupt MTC bargaining relationships at government installations, most recently at the Charleston, S.C., Naval Shipyard where it was turned back in a March election.

Pres. Paul Burnsky of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. expressed the hope that "the decisive show of confidence in AFL-CIO unions by the workers at Norfolk, as well as Charleston, will bring an end to these mischievous raids by organizations outside the mainstream of the labor movement."

Energy Policy Tied To Full Employment

A national government policy on fuels and energy must foster the goals of maximum employment, environmental safeguards and the protection of free enterprise, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Labor's prime concern is with jobs that pay a living wage, Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said in testimony before the Senate Interior Committee.

But he also noted that the federation has long called for a comprehensive national energy policy that would protect and preserve the environment while guarding against adverse effects of monopolies.

Biemiller called for a national policy that would exert controls on the development of energy technology, assuring that workers are not thrown out of their jobs.

"Our unions are in many cases the frustrated victims of technological innovations," he said. Unless existing conditions are corrected, a resistance to national policies will result.

A decent living wage is an essential part of labor's campaign for maximum employment, he said in noting that nearly 30 percent of the population earns wages at or near the poverty line.

"The benefits of and comforts of a decent standard of living," Biemiller stressed, "are not only an unattainable dream, but too often a bitter mockery for the poor of the cities and the rural regions as well."

If benefits from energy are denied to those who need them most, this will add to the social unrest and loss of faith in democratic institutions, he said.

While much still must be done to curb air and water pollution in the environment, Biemiller said that these problems cannot be solved by limiting energy growth. To do so, he declared, would "do nothing more than create vast and perhaps insoluble problems for the next generation."

He called for the development of energy fuels that pollute less and which are more susceptible to control techniques.

Labor favors the use of fusion power as the long range answer to meet the future energy needs rather than the present generation water reactors or breeder reactors, he said.

The breeder reactor, Biemiller pointed out, involves the use of material of extremely high toxicity and risk.

He also cited concern over the abuse of land through coal strip mining operations.

Noting that there has been an ominous trend toward the reduction of competition in the nation's energy sector since World War II, Biemiller warned that a key element of national policy must be safeguards against monopolization.

He pointed out that in 1970, of the nation's 25 largest petroleum companies, all dealt in natural gas products, 18 in oil shale, 11 in coal, 18 in uranium and seven had ventured in tar sands.

Four of the largest coal companies are now subsidiaries of oil firms, and petroleum companies now produce 20 percent of the nation's coal, he added.

"If this goes on without strong doses of antitrust medicine or legislation to break up these giant combines," Biemiller stressed, "there will be concentration and entrenched dominance of all energy fuels by a handful of giant corporations."

This will result in "high prices to consumers, undue economic and political power, stifling of healthy competition, and threats to free political institutions," he said.

AFL-CIO Realigns Western Regions

The AFL-CIO has realigned the makeup of four of its western area regions with the closing of Region XIX which was headquartered in Denver, Federation Pres. George Meany announced.

Four states—Colorado, Wyoming, Utah and New Mexico—made up the former Region XIX.

Colorado was shifted to Region XVI which includes Oklahoma and Arkansas. New Mexico joins Texas in the expanded Region XVII. Wyoming becomes a part of Region XXI, joining Montana, Idaho, Oregon and Washington. Utah was added to Region XXII, which includes California, Nevada and Arizona.

The Region XIX headquarters in Denver will be operated as subregional office of Region XVI, Meany said.

Joblessness at 12-Year High In Major Areas

The three areas added to the substantial list were in Ohio: Canton, Lorain-Elyria and Youngstown-Warren.

The Labor Dept. said the higher unemployment levels were "due mainly to layoffs in the steel industry," as mills cut back production after stockpiling on the part of steel users who had feared an August steel strike.

Two Indiana areas were removed from the list—Terre Haute and South Bend.

Unemployment in South Bend reached its lowest point in a year, the Labor Dept. reported, as a result of recall of laid-off workers, some new hiring and a reduction in new layoffs. Fabricated metals, non-electrical machinery and transportation equipment accounted for most of the gain.

In Terre Haute, the drop was attributed to employment increases in the durable goods industries, but also to a gradual decline in the area's work force.

Eight smaller labor markets also were added to the substantial list, and three were removed, pushing that total to 785 locations with joblessness of at least 6 percent.

Many of the 785 smaller areas are suffering from "persistent" unemployment, defined by the Labor Dept. as a jobless rate averaging 6 percent over the past calendar year with the rate at least 50 percent above the national average over the past several years.

The eight smaller areas added to the list were McRae, Ga.; Farmington and Patten, Me.; Northumberland-Stratford, N.H.; Silver City, N.M.; Sulphur, Okla. and Morgan and Vernal, Utah.

Those removed from the list were Cheyenne and Pawnee, Okla., and Texarkana, Tex.

Labor Pushes Watchdog Effort:

Meany Cites Price Boosts, Scores One-Sided Freeze

Services, is designed to make sure legal price ceilings are observed, high quality is maintained and services are not reduced.

Meany's testimony to the Senate Banking Committee, presented by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, cited newspaper surveys and the government's own Consumer Price Index as "clear evidence that America has a price freeze in name only."

The New York Times earlier had reported that a day-to-day survey on 27 meat items by six professional price reporters revealed that some supermarkets had illegally raised the prices of seven popular cuts of meat. The price of porterhouse steak, for example, went from $1.99 a pound just before the freeze to $2.09 a pound a few days after.

A similar study by the Times also based on reports from the State Dept. of Agriculture & Markets, showed that prices of fish covered by the freeze rose three times as much as prices for exempt fish items, with the price of halibut steak jumping from $1.19 to $1.49 —a 25 percent increase.

And Meany's testimony noted that the Administration had cited an increase of only two-tenths of 1 percent in the September CPI as evidence that the freeze is working.

But, Meany said, the official Bureau of Labor Statistics report acknowledges that the price rise would have been double the reported figure if only the items subject to the freeze had been included.

"The government's own statistics prove," he said, that without effective enforcement mechanisms "the price freeze does not work."

It is up to Congress, Meany stressed, if there is to be a price control program, to "provide an effective system for setting price standards, detecting price changes, and for apprehending and punishing those who violate the law."

As for the modest fines for price violations in the Administration's proposed legislation, "these penalties amount to little more than a licensing fee for potential price violators."

In the absence of government enforcement machinery, the task consumers face in checking the ceiling prices of thousands of items in stores is enormously difficult, Meany noted. "But the Cost of Living Council has made it virtually impossible by again delaying the deadline for retail stores to post ceiling price information for consumers."

Meany said the postponement was ordered by Treasury Sec. John B. Connally after some Republican members of the House Banking Committee protested that price posting was a hardship for businessmen.

It apparently never occurred to the Administration and its Cost of Living Council, Meany suggested, that "millions of consumers might be hurt by their decision."

And Meany warned the Senate panel as he had the House Banking Committee the previous week that "if anyone thinks that workers are going to stand idly by and watch prices go up while their paychecks are frozen, he just doesn't know Americans."

On the same day that Connally told the House committee that interest rates were dropping on home mortgages, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board reported that rates were "moderately higher" than the previous month. (Story, this page.)

Meany also urged Senate confirmation of public members of the pay and price boards, strongly opposed the Administration's request that all its actions to date on the wage-price freeze be declared retroactively legal and asked rejection of the President's request to impose controls only on a single industry or section of the economy.

He reminded the committee that "this Administration—which has so vigorously regulated wages in the construction industry—has yet to make good on its promise to institute comparable price regulation in that industry."

And, Meany emphasized, the fact that "the Administration acted in panic" when it abruptly imposed the freeze in mid-August is no reason for Congress to act in equal haste to "rubber stamp" the legislative request.

Meanwhile, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis, in a letter to state and local central bodies, suggested steps they might take to implement the Oct. 12 decision of the federation's Executive Council to establish "our watchdog units to monitor prices. . . to insure that there is no price-gouging in America."

A number of central bodies, notably in New York, New Jersey, Chicago and Oregon, already have inaugurated such programs.

Perlis noted that with the postponement of the Nov. 1 deadline for retailers to post price ceiling lists, the American housewife would have to remember the pre-Aug. 15 prices charged on approximately 5,000 items in the average supermarket.

And although the absence of the price lists makes the job of monitoring that much more difficult, "it also makes our job that much more important, for without our voluntary efforts to monitor prices there would be virtually no enforcement or checking on the price front."

The importance of price monitoring by labor was underscored by reports that only 3,000 Internal Revenue Service field agents across the nation would be watching prices for the government—in addition to their regular duties of handling income tax cases.

Thirteen days before the freeze was scheduled to end, the Justice Dept. had filed suit against only six violators in the entire nation.

Perlis suggested to local federations that they appoint monitoring committees and invite all local unions, both inside and outside the AFL-CIO, to send representatives to a community-wide coordinating committee on price monitoring.

He said they should meet with local business groups and trades associations to impress on them "the importance of self-policing, cooperation and ethical practices," and establish a point of contact with the IRS for filing complaints and referring violations.

A price-monitoring operation already has been established by the New York City AFL-CIO under which 580 local unions affiliated with the central body will set up price watch committees.

The committees will arrange cooperation by the 1.25 million union members in gathering information on prices and price-gouging and funnel it to the central body's Community Services Committee.

New Jersey AFL-CIO Pres. Charles H. Marciante said labor in that state wants "to be part of this national contribution toward effective price controls and there is no more cooperative and informed source than the 750,000 members of organized labor and their families who constitute more than 50 percent of the entire population of New Jersey."

The Chicago AFL-CIO used its own radio station, WCFL, to announce formation of its price-watchdog operation, and set up a special phone number to take recorded complaints of price violations around the clock.

In the first 24 hours of operation, more than 600 complaints and inquiries were received from the public.

Chicago AFL-CIO Pres. William F. Lee said the federation will be reaching out to all unions, consumer organizations, civil rights groups, churches and community groups to "join us in this effort designed to make the real fight on inflation."

In Oregon a group of 16 labor officials have formed the Oregon Labor Price-Wage Watchdog Committee. State AFL-CIO Pres. Edward J. Whelan said the group would meet as often as necessary to make sure all local unions will have the assistance they need to monitor prices.

Mortgage Interest Rates Climb for Fourth Month

Home mortgage rates rose during September for the fourth consecutive month, but the Nixon Administration maintained its "hands off" policy on interest rates as the nation headed for Phase II of the President's new economic programs.

The Federal Home Loan Bank Board announced that the effective interest rate charged borrowers for newly built homes with conventional mortgages averaged 7.82 percent as against 7.74 percent in August. For existing homes, the rate increased from 7.71 to 7.76 percent.

The Home Loan Bank Board released the figures at about the same time that Treasury Sec. John B. Connally was testifying before the House Banking Committee on an Administration bill for Phase II giving the President "stand-by" authority to control interest rates.

But Connally told the committee the Administration will not use this power anyway and declared that interest rates had been coming down since the freeze.

Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), chairman of the committee, said he was sure Connally was "well meaning" when he appeared before the committee "contending that mortgage rates were decreasing."

"Repeatedly," Patman said, "the Administration has assured the Congress and the press that interest rates have been coming down during the freeze, but now we have a definite contradiction of these claims."

Patman said the government has little or no information on the broad range of consumer credit for car loans and other products.

After the President announced the wage-price-rent freeze last August, the Home Loan Bank Board took action to free an additional $800 million for lending to home buyers in the hope that this increased supply of money would drive down interest rates.

The Administration did not move to control interest rates, it said, because it did not have that authority under the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970 on which the freeze was based and which the Administration is now seeking to extend.

Patman pointed out at that time that the President had the authority to impose controls on interest under other existing legislation.

4 Percent Guideline Set For Dividend Increases

The first post-freeze guideline produced by the Administration's Phase II machinery for economic controls is a "voluntary" one on dividend rates issued by the new Committee on Interest Rates & Dividends.

The committee said that corporation dividends should not be increased by more than 4 percent during 1972, and they should not go up at all during the remainder of 1971.

By Nov. 15, the committee will announce the technical details of the voluntary dividend limitation program, specifying coverage and exemptions, it said.

The committee, headed by Federal Reserve Board Chairman Arthur F. Burns, made it clear in issuing the 4-percent guideline, that a corporation could use any one of three years —1969, 1970 or 1971—as the base period for determining increases.

This meant that a corporation could choose its highest dividend payment over the past three years, as adjusted for stock dividends and splits, and increase that amount by 4 percent.

Burns told the House Banking Committee that "some exceptions, may, of course, be necessary to facilitate the raising of capital for expansion, particularly by small businesses."

Although Burns has said in the past that dividend increases should be "equitably related" to wage rates, he told the committee the 4 percent standard had no special application to wage increases because pay increases "could be something different entirely."

Joseph Walsh Dies, Retired Editor

Wilkes-Barre, Pa.—Joseph M. Walsh, retired editor of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO News, died Oct. 30 at Veterans Hospital here after a long illness. He was 77.

A native of Wilkes-Barre, Walsh entered the newspaper business while still in high school. After attending Lafayette College and Cornell summer school, he served as a reporter, sports editor and city editor of the Wilkes-Barre Record.

In 1942, he became the CIO regional director for northeastern Pennsylvania. Later he joined the staff of the Pennsylvania CIO Council and, following merger, became editor of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO News in 1960, a post he held until his retirement in July 1970.

Walsh was a charter member of Newspaper Guild Local 120 in Wilkes-Barre, having joined in 1937. He served as an international vice president of the Guild from 1941 to 1945.

He is survived by his wife Agnes, five children and ten grandchildren.

AFL-CIO Lists Speakers For 9th Convention

The AFL-CIO has announced the list of guest speakers for its Ninth Constitutional Convention which will open on Thursday, Nov. 18, at the Americana Hotel in Bal Harbour, Fla.

On Friday, Nov. 19, the speakers will be Sec. of Labor James Hodgson; Joseph Almogi, Minister of Labor of Israel; Hugh Shearer, Prime Minister of Jamaica, and J. Curtis Counts, director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

On Monday, Nov. 22, the speakers will be Yitzhak Ben-Aharon, General Secretary of Histadrut, and John Geiger, national commander of the American Legion.

Also on Monday, the AFL-CIO will present its Murray-Green award to Jerry Lewis.

On Tuesday, Nov. 23, E. Vernon Jordan, executive director of the United Negro College Fund, will speak. He is executive director-elect of the National Urban League.

The fraternal delegates to the convention from the British Trades Union Congress will be Hugh Scanlon, president of the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, and Cyril Plant, secretary of the Inland Revenue Staff Federation.

The fraternal delegate from the Canadian Labor Congress will be L. H. Lorrain, vice president of the CLC and first vice president of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers.

The Policy of Deceit

THIS IS THE AGE of Madison Avenue. This is another way of saying this is the age of public relations. This is the age of propaganda. And, to put it quite bluntly, the age of deceit.

This is the age where, using the techniques of Madison Avenue, you brainwash a nation: you deceive the people as a whole. The truth is no longer important.

We have adopted and we have refined the "big lie" technique that was practiced by Hitler and has been practiced for 52 years by the Soviets.

Madison Avenue now seems to be a part of the American way of life. If you are not willing to be deceived, you are just sort of out of step with things.

Well, I am out of step with things, I guess. I am not willing to be deceived.

When you look back, look at the President of the United States. This was the No. 1 anti-Communist that this country had. I know, because I was No. 2. I didn't like being No. 2, but I concede he was No. 1.

Do you remember his early campaigns? Oh, he was the most ferocious anti-Communist this country ever saw. And his technique in running for election was to charge the other person with being soft on communism. He believed in freedom. He believed in a free society. He was against tyranny. He was for the free way of life, with no compromise.

Well, now he is a realist—someone who accepts things as they are. Back in the '30s, we were told you have to accept Hitler; you have to be a realist. You have to accept Mussolini. You are out of date if you don't accept these people.

So now we have 1971 realism. We don't see much wrong with Mao Tse-tung. We don't see much wrong with Russian communism. You have to be realistic.

AND THEN we have the domestic situation where the economic problems of this country, with Madison Avenue's cooperation, are being laid at the feet of labor.

Labor is to blame; labor is to blame for everything. We have to have a whipping boy, and you have to distract attention from your own shortcomings.

I would like to see the Administration tell big business, "your contracts are nullified." We have always believed in this society of ours in the sanctity of a contract. Well, we've got contracts and we are being told they can't be honored because this would hurt big business. This would hurt the country.

WE FACE SERIOUS days ahead but we still have our principles. We still think the truth is important. We still think that good faith is important in dealing with people or with groups, with unions or companies. We still think that human freedom is important and we don't believe you can compromise with human freedom.

I don't believe there is any future in a policy of deceit. And, as far as the American trade union movement is concerned, we are not prepared to compromise our principles on the ground of expediency or on the ground of realism.

A Word Edgewise:

'That Mac Fellow' Looks Good To Sly New Hampshire Voters

By John P. Roche

THE OTHER DAY, I was up visiting friends in New Hampshire and they invited me to a rehearsal. A bit startled—they are not amateur actors—I inquired "A rehearsal of what?" "Why," they said, "the primary of course." This was a new one so I asked to be filled in. With any kind of luck, I was told, the state will receive more income from the presidential primary next March than from the ski season. "Its a real bonanza," one informant said, "but it calls for careful preparation."

"Suppose," he continued, "the pollsters came to Concord and started ringing doorbells. But when they started asking questions, nobody had ever heard of McCloskey or McGovern or Jackson or Lindsay?"

"Can't you see?" added another, "It would be tragic. One columnist would say the Democratic primary was a farce; another would say the Republican one was a joke. It could cost us millions! All those candidates would write off New Hampshire and save their money for some nut state like California or Oregon."

"Then there is the press," put in another participant. "Our state liquor stores are counting on a 30 percent jump in sales in January and February, the telephone company is laying on additional hands to get 50 more phones in every motel, Telex machines in every town of more than 100, and all sorts of fancy television lines."

By now I was intrigued and with a little persuasion managed to get a copy of the "Primary Manual," which is very closely held. While not quite the size of the final Army-Marine plan for invading Saipan, it is a massive document which seems to have anticipated every possible problem.

By Dec. 15, a coordinator will be named in every election district. His is a non-, or better, multi-partisan function: he must organize and prepare the electorate for the coming invasion. His slogan is: "Keep Every Candidate in the Race!"

"You just can't relax for a minute," an experienced coordinator told me, "or you risk the Romney cop-out." In 1968, it seems, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, who was supporting George Romney against Nixon, had a secret poll taken in New Hampshire. "Our men were caught off guard," said my New Hampshire host, "the pollsters sneaked in here around Christmas and Nixon came out ahead."

"Not just ahead," said a new voice, "That wouldn't have been so bad. He absolutely clobbered Romney, 64 to 12 and Romney quit. Which meant, in fact that Rockefeller kept all that money home. If we had been on the ball, Rocky would probably have sunk a couple of million—all we had to do was alert one Republican in three to say 'Romney' to the pollsters. That would have sucked him in, with all that Rockefeller. . . ."

"No use crying over spilt milk," my host interrupted, "what's important is 1972 and this one should be easy. We are telling all our people that when the pollsters turn up, they should say, 'I ain't rightly figured how I'll vote, but that Mac fellow looks pretty good.' If the pollster is from the Republicans, he will say 'You mean McCloskey?' On the other hand, the Democrats will ask 'McGovern?' The answer is 'Yup.' That should keep everybody in the game."

TV, IT SEEMS, has created special demands, notably for "cracker-barrel philosophers," but each district coordinator already has several in training.

"It's that damn Yankee accent," my friend told me. "The local sages have to sound like Calvin Coolidge, but we dug up an 85-year-old retired speech professor who has been training them. The hardest thing is that 'Eeeeya' that you lead off with."

It was hard to ask, but necessary: "Isn't this all a bit dishonest, misleading the American people like that?"

"Eeeeya," he said, "you might put it that way. But then if people want to think that political events in a wacky state like New Hampshire have national meaning, why should we disillusion them? There would just be that much more money for Wisconsin, where they really cheat: they let you vote in either primary no matter how you're registered! Golly, if we had just thought of that. . . ." As he began to sound more and more like Calvin Coolidge, I quietly slipped away.

Living Costs Still Rising:

Nixon Anti-Inflation Program Fails to Treat Basic Causes

By Sidney Margolius

THE THREE-MONTH price freeze—more of a slush than a real freeze—ends Nov. 13. It will be replaced by a price commission which will try to restrain further inflation by reviewing proposed price increases.

The new commission, however, can do little to correct present high costs. It can only fight a delaying action against further increases. The real problem is that the Administration's program of slowing down inflation treats the symptoms but provides few real cures for the basic causes, especially the high costs of housing, food, transportation and medical care. These are the main forces behind the inflation.

In announcing his new price commission, the President pointed out that the Wholesale Price Index went down in September, and considered this evidence of the program's success so far. The fact is, wholesale prices usually rise in early summer and level off in the fall in any case.

Moreover, the wholesale index does not include some of the most volatile components of the Consumer Price Index such as interest rates, medical care, property taxes, land costs, auto insurance, and service costs in general.

The wholesale index covers only commodities, which have gone up at a lower rate during this inflation than the consumer's living costs—less than 15 percent since 1967 compared to 23.

If the Administration faced up to the real reasons for the inflation, it could start controlling it by telling the FHA to reduce mortgage rates with the help of government mortgage-finance agencies. The Administration could also revise some of the present agricultural policies that help raise food costs.

Right now in many parts of the country, mortgage-seekers are being asked to pay 7.5 percent interest while sellers are asked to pay an additional mortgage bonus of 6 to 7 points. A "point" is the equivalent of 1 percent of the amount of the mortgage. You also can figure that each two points is the equivalent of paying an additional one-fourth of 1 percent mortgage interest. Thus, paying six points of bonus money on top of a stated rate of 7.5 percent is the same as paying a mortgage rate of 8.25 percent.

The most immediate problem is food prices. While the Administration fools around with gimmicky game plans, livestock growers are reducing supplies of pork. So expect higher meat prices this winter.

Watch gasoline prices, too. Many of the complaints of price increases involved gas stations.

While some medical authorities for a long time have questioned the claims and even effectiveness of many household remedies sold without prescriptions, government authorities at long last are getting braver about challenging such products.

Recently Dr. Charles Edwards, head of the Food & Drug Administration, told a congressional committee that the FDA had sought to seize Excedrin P.M., Asper Sleep and Ornex because manufacturers had indicated in ads that these were something "new." But when charged with failure to comply with "new drug" requirements, the manufacturers then contended that the products were not new but consisted only of well-known ingredients.

One of the most revealing incidents, showing how manufacturers reformulate, repackage and rename old ingredients, is the case of Vivarin. This product is being promoted as making you "a more exciting woman" if you have come to realize that you may be "boring your husband to death."

But it turned out that the main active ingredient in Vivarin, as in many similar stimulants, is caffeine, at three times the cost of a cup of coffee which even an unexciting wife could easily prepare.

WHILE ANTACIDS for indigestion and laxatives are probably the most widely promoted over-the-counter medicines, another heavily advertised group is nonprescription sleeping pills. Most of these merely have a mild antihistamine as the chief active ingredient and are "essentially ineffective in the dosages used," Commissioner Edwards said.

However, there may be other dangers than inflated prices in overmedicating yourself with non-prescription drugs. Dr. Edwards has warned that the overuse of "mood drugs" is becoming increasingly acute.

He attributes the heavy use to "the tremendous wave of advertising, especially on TV, creating an environment in which the consumer feels that reaching for a pill, tablet or capsule is a panacea for all his ills."

W. James Bicket, a representative of the American Pharmaceutical Association, the national organization of pharmacists, also has testified that much advertising for non-prescription drugs exaggerates and "even attempts to convince people they have non-existent diseases."

Yet none of the government agencies, including the Federal Trade Commission which has the major responsibility over advertising, have stepped in to tone down the misleading commercials. The fooling that takes place nowadays more often is in the omission of relevant facts than in the actual commission of deception. Thus, manufacturers of pain-relieving products advertise over and over that they have more of "the most effective ingredient" or "the ingredient that doctors recommend" without saying that this much-boasted "ingredient" is merely aspirin.

'Bread-and-Butter' Issues:

Young Voters' Attitudes Linked To Basic Economic Problems

ECONOMIC and "bread-and-butter" issues will figure heavily in how the 25 million young Americans eligible to vote for the first time in 1972 elections cast their ballots, Penn Kemble, chairman of Frontlash '72 predicted.

The majority of that group are "full-time employes . . . not college students," declared Kemble, and they feel the sharp impact of high unemployment and rising costs at the time they are just starting their careers and families.

He said that young workers "are most frequently unemployed because they're lowest on seniority lists," and that high interest rates and taxes cause them "great financial difficulties" as they begin "setting up a household . . . and raising families."

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Kemble said that about half of the new young voters are in the 18 to 21 age group newly enfranchised by the 26th Amendment, and the balance were under 21 in 1968.

"We're hoping to reach them in a variety of ways—through unions, wherever possible," he said, adding that organized labor has been "very helpful in getting us started."

But, he noted, young workers are often in low-paid jobs and "occupations least organized by unions." To reach many of the "non-students, you really have to mount old-fashioned registration drives that most politicians and organizations have given up on," he said, and the trade unions are very active in that area.

Kemble said that efforts to register young voters often meet the problem of "local election officials who are dependent on local political officials for their jobs and are reluctant to open the voter registration books" to young people. And, he stressed, that situation is "just as bad for non-students—working youth—minority youth—as it is for students, although most of what you read about this is directed at the problems of college students registering."

By Press Associates, Inc.

"AMBASSADOR." Roget's Thesaurus makes the word a synonym for "deputy," and "deputy in turn is defined in a number of ways including "vicar, lieutenant, surrogate, secondary, representative, delegate, minister, broker, negotiator, connection, front or front man, agent, instrument, tool, factor, steward, proctor, gomashta (Ind.), dubash (Ind.), one's man of business, commission agent, commissary, commissioner, friend at or in court, next friend (Law), amicus curiae (L.), prochein ami or amy (Law)."

Webster's New World Dictionary defines "ambassador" as "the highest ranking representative appointed by one country or government to represent it in another."

Harsh as it may sound, Pres. Nixon made all of these definitions seem only too true in his address to the nation naming his two latest nominees to the United States Supreme Court.

Many American Presidents have been accused of naming men of their own political or judicial stripe to the highest court.

Theodore Roosevelt was accused of naming "liberal" Oliver Wendell Holmes to the court as a gesture against his more conservative Republican friends.

Woodrow Wilson was excoriated for naming that "radical" Louis D. Brandeis to the court.

Franklin Roosevelt was accused of wanting to "pack" the court because it turned its back on New Deal legislation.

Even Eisenhower appointed Earl Warren, presumably a man of his own conservative thinking—but it didn't turn out that way.

In brief, Presidents can be expected to turn to men with whose general philosophy they sympathize when Supreme Court appointments are on their desks.

But never has an American President so openly told the nation that he wanted men who shared his own conservative "judicial philosophy" on the court. Never has one so clearly defined the area—mostly law and order—in which he wanted a new turn in court decisions. Never has one so unfairly burdened two appointees to the court with his own publicly expressed philosophy by which they should be guided.

Despite his disclaimers and protestations that, of course, they must be guided by their own judgments, he has come as close as any President has ever come to making them his personal representatives on the court.

So clear has this become that organized labor already has called for the confirmation of Lewis F. Powell, Jr. and William H. Rehnquist "only if their ideology conforms to that of the Constitution rather than that of the President."

ONE OF THE BITTEREST Supreme Court confirmation battles in American history raged about Associate Justice Brandeis in 1916 when he was named to the court by Wilson. That was 55 years ago, and a contrast between the battle that raged about that nomination and what has been taking place over Nixon nominees in the past two years is more than instructive.

There was no quarrel over the legal and personal qualifications of Brandeis. Even his opponents conceded that he had "vast experience," that he was a "brilliant lawyer," that he was a "great jurist" and that he was a "distinguished member of the bar."

Contrast this with the virtual "instructions" with which Nixon loaded his nominees when he labeled them as sharing his basically "conservative philosophy," when he clearly expressed his disagreements with past court decisions that he felt weakened law and order and called for a redressment of the balance between the forces of order and disorder.

The President may be right in his analysis of recent Supreme Court decisions—many millions of Americans undoubtedly will agree with him in this respect.

But, men should not be named to the Supreme Court to carry out presidential objectives. They are being named to the third, co-equal branch of the government.

BREAD-AND-BUTTER issues—not TV charisma— will be the main factor in how 25 million young Americans voting for the first time in 1972 cast their ballots, Frontlash '72 Chairman Penn Kemble, center, predicted on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Warren Weaver, left, of the New York Times and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine.

Hawaii Delegates Focus On Economy, Education

Honolulu—The 4th biennial convention of the Hawaii AFL-CIO elected eight vice presidents, approved resolutions on economics and education and heard a crescendo of criticism of Pres. Nixon's new economic policies.

Pres. Walter H. Kapau was re-elected as head of the state central body by acclamation. The eight new vice presidents, in addition to serving on the state federation's executive board, will make up the executive committee, which will meet monthly to implement policy created by the higher board.

The new vice presidents are Jim Crane, chairman of the Oahu Division; Elmo Samson, I. B. Peterson, Emile Lee and Tommy Sing, all from the island of Oahu.

The neighboring islands are represented by Division Chairmen Herb Perreira of Hawaii, Walt Correa of Maui, and Clarence Takashima of Kavai.

Crane is executive secretary of the Hawaii Federation of Teachers, Samson is a Laborers business agent, Lee is business agent of the Marine Cooks & Stewards. Peterson and Sing are presidents of their respective locals, the Musicians and the Lithographers & Photoengravers. Correa represents the United Public Workers and Takashima and Perreira are both members of the Hawaii Government Employes Association.

The Public Workers and the Government Employes recently became part of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

Delegates unanimously adopted resolutions supporting state legislation that would require the presence of a qualified nurse in all public schools, would establish a legal maximum of 25 students per academic class and require that a student's curriculum include a course on labor history.

In one resolution, the convention strongly urged that labor representatives be given a role in implementation of the Public Service Employment Act of 1971, a measure aimed at providing jobs for the unemployed and underemployed during periods of high joblessness.

Smooth implementation of the act will be accomplished only if organized labor is involved from the very start, delegates said.

3,500 Benefit In Flint Glass 3-Year Pact

Toledo, Ohio—The American Flint Glass Workers signed a contract calling for wage increases of $1.20 an hour over a three-year period with the Glass Container Manufacturers Institute.

The agreement covers 3,500 journeymen and apprentices at 87 locations in the industry.

Union Pres. George M. Parker said the new contract provides for increases of 59 cents an hour the first year, 30 cents the second and 31 cents in the third year. The first-year increase raises the hourly wage for journeymen moldmakers to $5.

First year apprentices received an increase of 46 cents to $3.70 an hour.

Parker expressed confidence that the increases would be allowed by the Phase 2 Pay Board because they "are similar to patterns set by other unions in the industry before the freeze."

The previous contract had expired Sept. 1 but had been extended on a day-to-day basis. The wage increases are scheduled to be retroactive to that date.

Labor-Backed Candidates Do Well:

State, Local Issues Mark 1971 'Off-Year' Elections

legislative contests, Democrats scored major gains in New Jersey where the GOP has had one-sided control of both houses of the legislature.

Late returns were being awaited to determine whether the Democrats had captured control of the lower house as well as nearly doubling their membership in the state Senate.

In three states where major tax issues were put up to referendum votes, positions taken by labor were decisively supported.

Montana voters rejected a sales tax opposed by the State AFL-CIO by a margin bigger than two-to-one. Maine voters turned down an initiative proposal to repeal the state's income tax by an almost three-to-one majority. The state's labor movement had strongly opposed the repeal effort. And Florida voters overwhelmingly supported a corporate profits tax that had been urged by Gov. Reubin Askew (D) and opposed by the state's big business interests.

In Kentucky, Democrats healed deep primary wounds to elect Democrat Wendell Ford to the governorship. Ford, currently lieutenant governor, sharply attacked the Nixon economic policy during the campaign. The incumbent governor, Republican Louis B. Nunn, was ineligible to run for a second term and the capture of the statehouse will boost the Democratic edge in governorships to 30 of the 50 states.

On a clear liberal-conservative issue, the victory of Henry E. Howell, Jr., in Virginia attracted national attention even though the office of lieutenant governor is hardly one to excite more than local interest.

Howell, known throughout the state for his championship of consumer issues, put together a coalition of workers, blacks and liberal Democrats to win as an independent against Democratic and Republican candidates who split the conservative vote. Ironically, it was the Old Guard's Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr., who broke the party line identification pattern in Virginia politics by winning re-election in 1968 as an independent after shunning the Democratic primary.

Howell, who was narrowly edged out for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination two years ago, chose to run as an independent after Virginia Democrats abandoned a statewide primary in favor of a party nominating convention. He has already declared his intention to run in 1972 for the governorship, now held by Republican Linwood Holton. The lieutenant-governor vacancy was created by the death of a popular Democratic incumbent.

In Deep South Mississippi, race was obviously a factor in the division of votes between Charles Evers, brother of the slain NAACP leader, and Democrat Wiliam Waller.

But Waller, unlike his predecessors, both campaigned as a moderate without appeals to prejudice and had a record as district attorney in Jackson that earned friendly comment from Evers, even during the campaign. He ended up with a respectable share of votes in black precincts, winning statewide by a bigger margin than most observers had predicted.

Racial divisions were clearly factors in a number of city mayoralty elections, but not always as decisively so as some newspaper stories had assumed.

The Republican victory in normally Democratic Cleveland upset the strategy of outgoing Mayor Carl B. Stokes, who twice had won election with overwhelming black support and a significant share of votes from the 60 percent white majority of the city.

His hand-picked successor, running as an independent, failed to carry the black neighborhoods as overwhelmingly as expected. Republican Ralph J. Perk, long one of the city's strong vote-getters, piled up a lead in normally Democratic "ethnic" neighborhoods of the city.

There was party-splitting also in Philadelphia, where Police Chief Frank Rizzo overcame some prominent Democratic defections to defeat a wealthy Philadelphia "blue-blood," W. Thatcher Longstreth. Rizzo was known as a tough, honest cop and had the backing of outgoing Mayor James H. Tate. He lost the normally Democratic black wards, but scored impressively in other sections of the city.

In Boston, in a non-partisan election, incumbent Mayor Kevin H. White easily won re-election against challenger Louise Day Hicks, the congresswoman who in past city elections had been tabbed the candidate of the "white backlash" voters. White's record, not racial issues, was considered the key to the election contest.

San Francisco Mayor Joseph L. Alioto overcame the handicap of a federal indictment in a legal fee case to win an easy victory over 10 opponents.

Democrat William D. Schaefer was elected mayor of Baltimore with nearly 88 percent of the vote.

In Indiana, Republican Richard Lugar won re-election as mayor of Indianapolis and Democrat Richard G. Hatcher, a Negro in a city with a black majority, was re-elected mayor of Gary.

Strong labor support proved an important factor in the Jersey City mayoralty election, where Dr. Paul Jordan won his first political race by outpolling both the candidate of the old-line political machine and the son of a former mayor.

Nixon Health Plan Held 'Bail-Out' for Insurers

The Nixon Administration's national health insurance proposal would not control rising medical costs, Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock testified before the House Ways and Means Committee.

Woodcock appeared before the committee to support the National Health Security Program introduced by Representatives Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) and James Corman (D-Calif.)

Earlier, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany also testified in support of Health Security.

If the Nixon proposal were enacted, Woodcock told the Committee, it "would result in higher national expenditures for health purposes" than under Health Security.

The Nixon program would bail out and reward insurance companies and mean higher costs for consumers, Woodcock stated. "Insurance companies can take care of themselves," he added. "It is time to help consumers."

The National Farmers Union told the committee that the Health Security Bill is the best approach to solving the health care problems of rural America.

NFU Pres. Tony Dechant noted: "Rural areas, where almost 27 percent of Americans live, have less than 12 percent of our physicians, 18 percent of nurses, 14 percent of pharmacists, 8 percent of pediatricians and 4 percent of psychiatrists."

The U.S. Catholic Conference and the Board of Christian Social Concerns of the United Methodist Church endorsed the principles of Health Security without specifically endorsing the legislation.

The church organizations both urged enactment of a federally operated health plan guaranteeing adequate health care as a right of citizenship.

Blue Cross Tactics Hit In Health Security Fight

that the Blue Cross man was also "doing an effective job of sabotaging" labor's Health Security campaign.

Seidman warned that the Colorado and South Carolina incidents may be only a small part of the insurance industry's efforts to defeat or weaken Health Security legislation. He suggested state labor bodies advise the federation's Dept. of Social Security on any questionable situations.

The confidential report of a Blue Cross official which was disclosed by Sen. Kennedy at a Senate health subcommittee hearing stressed the importance of a low-key lobbying campaign.

It described how a task force of Blue Cross representatives was brought to Washington for a month-long indroctrination after which "each of the task force members returned to his home region to put into effect the game plan."

In an internal memo from Blue Cross Pres. Walter J. McNerney to the organization's area executive, the objective of the congressional lobbying campaign was pin-pointed: "We trust their efforts will help substantially in developing an appreciation in the minds of key decision makers that only through Blue Cross can truly effective and efficient provision be made for financing the health care of the nation."

Kennedy said at the hearing that "there's a very serious question raised" about the use of Blue Cross subscribers' premiums for lobbying activities.

With Bookbinders Union:

Lithographers Vote Approval of Merger

New Orleans—Delegates to the Lithographers & Photoengravers convention here put an enthusiastic seal of approval on merger with the Bookbinders.

The merger agreement had been ratified two weeks earlier by delegates to the Bookbinders convention, and the final step is up to the the membership of the two unions.

If the recommendations of the officers and the action of the convention delegates is approved in referendum votes, the new Graphic Arts International Union will come into existence by next Labor Day.

Ratification, by a weighted vote of 55,451 to 1,693, came midway in the six-day convention of the LPIU.

A message from AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland termed the proposed merger "clearly in the best interest of your members, of your craft, and of the trade union movement as a whole."

To LPIU Pres. Kenneth J. Brown, the merger action was a possible forerunner of an eventual merger of all graphic arts unions.

The 1964 merger between the formerly separate Photoengravers and Lithographers unions, Brown said in a report to the convention, proved "that such mergers could result in significant improvement in wages, hours and working conditions of the members we serve."

Brown saw as the fruit of merger "programs, activities and collective bargaining agreements which cannot be obtained by separate unions squabbling over what may well be a diminishing job market."

And he said the influence of the workers in the industry will be considerably greater than could be achieved by "separate unions pulling in different directions."

The convention met in the shadow of unemployment and an economic squeeze in both the United States and Canada. One local's resolution noted that for "the first time in memory," it had a surplus of skilled craftsmen."

A resolution condemned the wage freeze as "inequitable, unfair and discriminatory." It demanded that "wage increases already negotiated" be permitted during Phase II of the economic stabilization program. And it urged that Canadian products be exempted from the import surcharge "in recognition of the integration of the economies of our two countries."

Another convention resolution took a cautious approach to the four-day week, insisting on a number of safeguards for working conditions and overtime pay.

The convention also strongly opposed any modification of the eight-hour workday provisions of the Walsh-Healy Public Contracts Act and other federal laws.

The 252 convention delegates represented 122 local unions.

Grain Millers Strike Yields Major Gains

Minneapolis—The Grain Millers announced that a four day strike at seven plants of the American Crystal Sugar Co. has been settled with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

The strike halted sugar plant operations at beet harvest time, a critical period for the refineries. The seven plants are in Chaska, Crookston, East Grand Forks and Moorhead, Minn., Mason City, Ia., Drayton, N.D. and Rocky Ford, Colo.

Grain Millers Pres. Roy O. Wellborn said the agreement produced major gains, including wage increases totaling $1.20 an hour over three years for permanent workers and 62 to 65 cents an hour for seasonal workers.

Differences over raises for seasonal workers, severance pay and shift differentials had led to the walkout.

Wellborn said that a satisfactory agreement had been reached on those issues along with healthy increases in pensions and medical insurance.

"Strict seniority standards and the posting of open jobs has also been achieved for the first time," he said.

The old contract expired on Aug. 1 but had been extended until negotiations reached an impasse in mid-October. The new contract is to be retroactive to Aug. 1 and Wellborn said he expected the government to allow the wage increases to keep from creating "inequities in the industry."

Air Line Dispatchers Okay Council Shifts

Seattle—The 25 airline councils of the Air Line Dispatchers Association are free to seek affiliation with other labor organizations on the basis of a resolution approved by the 60 delegates at the 29th annual ALDA convention.

Several attempts to merge the ALDA with other unions had been voted down in referendums by the union's membership over the past several years. In the most recent merger referendum, held earlier this year, the 886 members turned down affiliation with the Machinists by 50 votes.

Pres. Robert E. Commerce, who has headed the ALDA for the past 13 years, is retiring from office effective Jan. 1. The top union office will now become a part-time position. Also retiring as of Jan. 1 is Sec.-Treas. George A. Paull.

The convention elected Frank O. Wicks, Eastern Airlines council, president and Warren J. Fitzpatrick of Northwest Airlines secretary-treasurer. Frank J. Perry of Piedmont Airlines was elected vice president, succeeding L. Frew Riter of Ozark Airlines.

The union said that its headquarters operations based in Falls Church, Va., will be closed and the functions will be handled by offices in Miami where Wicks is located and in Seattle where Fitzpatrick is located.

Beirne Named to Panel On Health Education

Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers has been appointed to the President's new Committee on Health Education, Chairman Joseph C. Wilson announced.

Foot-Dragging Charged On Occupational Safety

Columbus, O.—The Labor Dept. was accused here of "ponderously dragging its feet" in bringing about effective operation of the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1970.

Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., told the Midwest Labor Conference that the Labor Dept. has asked for an "excessively modest" budget, that it has been slowing down in the hiring of qualified personnel to administer the statute, and that it has shown "prejudice" against the use of trade unionists as compliance officers.

In addition, Clayman blamed the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare for "strange lethargy" in its plans for starting research projects to identify and locate dangerous hazards to health and safety.

Clayman set forth his charges against what he said was a background of "common knowledge" that the various states have "dismally failed" to enforce sound safety and health laws. Congress moved toward federal legislation in this field, he added, because of the widespread belief that the states had botched the job.

Nevertheless, the IUD official said, the Secretary of Labor has shown "unseemly haste" in turning back to these same state administrations the development of safety and health standards under the federal law.

The Secretary of Labor, Clayman charged, "is willing to permit the states to proceed under vague, fuzzy and uncertain guidelines, which constitute an open invitation to the states to subvert both the spirit and the letter of the law."

A major battleground in the struggle for the legislation was to win a requirement that workers or their representatives be permitted to accompany the safety inspector and the employer on inspection tours of the workplace.

That requirement, Clayman recalled, was aimed at eliminating a situation where the inspector never spoke to the worker about conditions, and where the employer cleaned up hazardous conditions just before the inspector's arrival, and let things go back to pot as soon as he was gone.

"This important worker's right was fiercely contested in Congress and was directly and specifically voted upon. The intent of Congress was made crystal clear," Clayman noted.

Nevertheless, he said, the Labor Dept. has failed to insist that the states be required to allow this same right for workers in their enforcement of the federal statute. The IUD official called it a "deliberate search for legalisms and technicalities in order to make things easier for employers."

Pieper, Dowell Retire from Regional Staff

Two veterans of depression organizing days were feted on their retirement from the AFL-CIO regional staff—Regional Director Fred C. Pieper in Denver and Assistant Director W. Elmer Dowell in St. Louis.

Pieper, 62, had been director in the Rocky Mountain region since 1955. A co-founder of the Auto Workers in Atlanta and participant in an early sit-down strike, Pieper served on the union's national council for the AFL in 1934, was a UAW executive board member until 1939, and helped negotiate the first multi-plant contract with General Motors Corp.

Following service with the Marine Corps during World War II, Pieper served as Louisiana-Mississippi regional director of the CIO, then worked in the national office as an assistant to the director of organization until merger. He and his wife Dorothy are returning to the Atlanta area, where he will continue to serve as a labor volunteer.

Dowell was the guest of the Missouri State AFL-CIO, the St. Louis Labor Council and the AFL-CIO regional staff at a retirement dinner in October. His retirement plans are indefinite.

Born in 1905 in Ethel, Mo., Dowell started work at the Fisher Body plant in Kansas City, Mo., in 1929. He helped form Federal Labor Union 19320 and was elected its secretary. After the UAW was formed, he became the first director of the GM department.

In 1939 the union split into two groups and Dowell was elected vice president of the group known as UAW-AFL, now the Allied Industrial Workers. Dowell represented the AFL in the sale of treasury bonds in World War II, was appointed an AFL staff organizer, and remained on the staff after merger, serving in Nebraska and Hawaii.

AFL-CIO Opposes Bill To Allow Gas Monopoly

Acting as a "people's lobby," the AFL-CIO urged the Senate Commerce Committee to reject a bill that would halt the court-ordered breakup of a monopoly corporation.

The bill, supported by a number of western senators, would permit the El Paso Natural Gas Co. to hold on to the Northwest Pipeline Co. it acquired 12 years ago—despite a series of Supreme Court rulings that the acquisition violated antitrust laws.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said the proposed legislation would amount to "perversion of antitrust law and policy."

Furthermore, he stressed in a letter to Commerce Committee Chairman Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), "if it is enacted, one huge corporation after another will use it as a precedent to ask Congress for legislative relief from adverse court decisions."

Biemiller charged that the El Paso corporation has conducted a "misleading" and "self-serving" campaign to convince Congress that it should not only be forgiven for its violations of antitrust laws, but should be "rewarded" for them.

"It is as though a man having been convicted of burglary requests that the penal code be waived in his case, as he would be able to use more effectively the articles he stole than the rightful owner."

Biemiller associated the AFL-CIO with a statement by Pres. Joseph Davis of the Washington State AFL-CIO earlier this year challenging El Paso's claim that consumers will be better off if the company is not broken up.

El Paso has produced no evidence to back up that assertion, Davis noted at the time. "The consumer," he said, "will suffer far greater harm if corporate giants are allowed to flout the law."

Biemiller wrote Magnuson that the AFL-CIO is taking a position on the bill "as the largest organization of consumers in the nation, and as an organization which has throughout its long history opposed monopoly in all forms."

Gene Kelly Retires From News Staff

Eugene A. Kelly has retired as an assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News after a distinguished newspaper and trade union career.

Kelly joined the staff of the AFL-CIO News in April 1960, following 20 years with the former Cleveland News and previous service on other Cleveland daily newspapers.

He was a founding member of the Cleveland local of the Newspaper Guild in 1933—which was designated Local 1 at the Guild's first convention. Kelly served more than 15 years on the local's executive board, including two terms as president. Besides participating actively in his own union, he covered many of the historic events of the labor movement as a reporter.

Urgency Stressed:

Meany Asks Action To Save Foreign Aid

disaster victims would be ended; international health and drug control programs would be terminated, and U.S. manufacturers and shippers who supply virtually all goods purchased with aid funds would face heavy cutbacks.

Meany called on Congress as a first step to pass a resolution temporarily continuing expenditures at present levels.

"Immediately thereafter," he urged, "Congress should proceed to draft a new measure designed to promote the welfare of the people in free, developing nations, primarily directed toward alleviating conditions of human deprivation, establishing democratic institutions, providing economic and technological know-how, and insuring adequate military assistance to defend and preserve national independence and promote international peace."

The abrupt rejection of the aid bill came after a heated 10-hour debate and a series of amendments that, at the end, left large numbers of senators dissatisfied for different reasons.

Top Administration officials are seeking to work out with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee a new bill that can muster majority support. Meanwhile, the first test of congressional sentiment is expected on the continuing resolution that has been introduced by the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee—to keep the program alive while the effort to shape a new bill goes on.

Meany termed the foreign assistance program "a sound, worthwhile and valuable instrument" and expressed the view that it has the support of the American people.

In other major congressional developments:

- The House neared final passage of a labor-backed, multi-billion dollar program of expanded aid to higher education. The bill would include a new program of federal grants to every college, based on enrollment.

Supporters warned that without increased federal aid, numerous colleges and universities would be forced to close down or to raise tuition rates beyond the means of most students eager for a college education.

The legislation also would extend existing programs of federal aid, including grants and loans to needy students and the work-study program.

- The Senate voted 86-0 approval of a bill setting increasingly higher standards to end industrial water pollution. It also would step up federal grants for municipal sewage treatment plants from last year's level of about $1 billion to $5 billion by 1975. Another feature would authorize low-interest loans to small firms faced with heavy expenditures for pollution-control equipment.

The AFL-CIO had strongly supported an expanded drive on water pollution at hearings earlier this year.

- The Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee voted 6-3 approval of a "postcard" registration system for federal elections, and set a maximum 30-day residence requirement for congressional elections. Present law prohibits states from imposing more than a 30-day residence rule for voting in presidential elections.

Under the Senate bill, sponsored by Committee Chairman Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.), the Census Bureau would send postcard registration forms to each home, preaddressed to the local registration board. The entire registration process could then be completed by mail. While states could still impose separate registration requirements for non-federal elections, the bill would provide financial incentives for using the federal system.

At the committee hearings last month, the AFL-CIO strongly supported national registration and voting standards legislation. Presently, Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller charged, millions of Americans are "locked out of the voting booth by voting laws as obsolete as the 12-hour day."

EXPORT OF AMERICAN JOBS was protested by nearly all 1,200 delegates to the Massachusetts AFL-CIO convention who recessed their session to march through downtown Boston urging the public to buy American-made goods and the government to place effective curbs on imports from low-wage countries.

HEW Welfare Plans for New York Held Cruel Experiments on Poor

Two welfare experiments the federal government is considering for New York State would debase the dignity and living standards of poor people, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned.

While the AFL-CIO favors "genuine welfare reform" and is working toward these changes, Meany said that organized labor vigorously opposes proposals that would "exploit welfare recipients as human guinea pigs in experiments based on medieval doctrines."

Meany called on Sec. Elliott L. Richardson of the Dept of Health, Education & Welfare to reject the two New York State proposals which are designated as "Incentives for Independence" and "Public Service Work Opportunities."

In a letter to Richardson, Meany said the objectives of public assistance are "to improve the living conditions and enhance the dignity of those who must depend on welfare to meet even minimal family needs."

"We are convinced that these two projects would have just the opposite effect," he stressed.

Meany noted that the "incentives" project would reduce annual welfare payments to a family of four to only $2,400—far below the recognized poverty level and existing payments. Then the family would have to participate in a complicated point system program to try to regain the lost payments.

It would receive a certain number of points, he noted, "by meeting certain arbitrary and very broadly defined behavior norms such as 'cooperating with the teacher,' participating in certain 'acceptable' activities such as children joining a 4-H club or the Boy Scouts, school attendance, taking care of neighbors' children," and others.

No matter how desirable some of these activities may be, Meany said, they should be left to individual choice.

"Far from being an incentive to independence, the Big Brother philosophy behind this proposal involves the most detailed scrutiny of the private lives of those who would be forced to participate in the project," he pointed out.

Meany also warned that huge administrative costs of the project would outweigh any benefits that may be gained.

Under the Public Service Work Opportunities project, the poor would have to work out their welfare payments in a government agency job or by caring for children of other mothers.

The AFL-CIO strongly favors giving welfare recipients every opportunity for meaningful employment, Meany stressed, "but we vigorously oppose outright work-for-relief programs."

He recalled that such programs in the depression era of the 1930s were found to be difficult and costly to administer and demeaning to the persons who were forced into them.

Jobs under the public service project would carry an onus of second class non-employment that would undermine the individual's dignity and discourage initiative, Meany asserted.

"Whether working in the public sector or for a private employer," Meany said, "workers should be paid decent wages and enjoy all fringe benefits and other conditions that go with the job."

Mothers required to work under this project should also be assured adequate child care for their children, he declared.

But there are no such safeguards in this proposal, Meany noted, and if it is approved, labor standards and the quality of decent child care will be jeopardized.

Federal Workmen's Compensation Urged to Safeguard Farm Workers

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to extend workman's compensation coverage to farm workers who are employed in one of the nation's most hazardous industries.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said in testimony before the House subcommittee on Agricultural Labor that the states have "shamefully ignored" their responsibility to the farm workers.

To correct this denial of the "oldest form of social insurance," Biemiller urged swift passage of a bill introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), who heads the subcommittee.

The bill would provide agricultural workers with workmen's compensation in the event of work injury or disease from unsafe, defective or unhealthful working conditions, sanitary facilities or housing furnished as incident to their employment.

The legislation further provides victims of injury or illness stemming from the use of toxic pesticides with benefits under the Federal Employes Compensation Act. A farm worker also would have the right to sue if injury or illness was due to gross negligence of his employer.

Federal action is necessary to bring all farm workers under workmen's compensation, Biemiller emphasized, because only 17 states grant such coverage.

Agricultural employers, he said, have duped great numbers of people into maintaining "a sentimental but false image of the traditional family farm worked by one man and a team of mules."

The truth, he continued, is that this is a day of huge "factory farms," of combines, automatic loaders, mechanical seeders, and power-driven corn pickers in which agricultural work "has become one of the nation's most hazardous occupations."

He presented the subcommittee with National Safety Council data showing the injury rate in agriculture is "well above" the all-industry rate and the rate of severe injury in agriculture "is one of the highest in any industry."

"Agriculture employers under existing arrangements have no incentive to minimize work hazards or reduce accidents," Biemiller said, adding that only through federal action can this be remedied.

The O'Hara bill, he noted, permits states which have met their responsibilities to farm workers to retain their jurisdiction over workmen's compensation. For states that are unwilling or unable to extend coverage, the measure provides for federal protection of the workers.

Veteran Organizer Rudolph Eskovitz Dies

Chicago—Rudolph Eskovitz, a veteran organizer with the AFL-CIO field staff in the Illinois-Iowa region, died of an apparent blood clot after he was hospitalized. He was 61.

Eskovitz was a port agent with the Marine Cooks & Stewards in Hawaii from 1937 until he joined the CIO organizing staff in 1950.

Bricklayers Name Joyce as Secretary

Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers announced the retirement of Sec. William R. Conners and the appointment of John T. Joyce to succeed Conners. Joyce's place as treasurer has been taken by Edward M. Bellucci of West Haven, Conn., special deputy for the union in that state.

Conners has been a union officer since 1940.

Methodists Hit BLS Changes As 'Disturbing'

The United Methodist Church has joined labor in protesting the Nixon Administration's apparent attempt to "politicize" the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

In a telegram to Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, Luther E. Tyson, director of economic life for the Methodists' General Board of Christian Social Concerns, denounced plans to place interpretation of the data the BLS collects in the hands of political appointees as "disturbing both to reason and to conscience."

"Furthermore," Tyson added, "your announced intention to forgo reports on employment and unemployment conditions in urban poverty areas during 1972 makes reasonable the charge of managing statistical data for political purposes." He urged that both decisions be reversed to protect BLS integrity.

Meany Charges Pay Board Tears Up Bargaining Pacts

Jobless Rate Dips to 5.8%, Wages Down

By John R. Oravec

The nation's jobless rate dipped to 5.8 percent in October, reflecting a slight increase in employment while the number of unemployed workers edged down, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

The BLS report on the job situation also showed the impact of the wage freeze on workers as average weekly earnings declined in October despite a longer workweek.

There were 4.9 million workers out of work last month on a seasonally adjusted basis. This is about 135,000 less than in September when the jobless rate was 6 percent. Unemployment has been fluctuating between 5.8 and 6.2 percent for almost a year, except for the drop in June to 5.6 percent.

While the jobless rate for white workers declined one-tenth of a point to 5.3 percent, the BLS said that unemployment for Negroes jumped by two-tenths of a point to 10.7 percent—the highest level in eight years. October is the first month that the Negro jobless rate has been double the white rate since August 1969.

Total employment rose over the month by 320,000 to 79.8 million, seasonally adjusted. But the civilian labor force also grew by 185,000 to 84.8 million.

In its report on earnings, the BLS said average weekly pay fell 2 cents to $129.11 in October while the average workweek increased four-tenths of an hour to 37.1 hours.

Building Trades Act To Bolster Councils

By Tom Castor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The 56th convention of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. empowered the department's top officers to make sweeping changes in the operation of its 531 state, local and provincial councils.

The more than 250 delegates, representing 17 affiliates with a combined membership of 3 million, also elected officers and heard speakers from labor, management and government, including Chairman John T. Dunlop of the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee.

Dunlop told the convention that "it is likely" his committee will continue to enjoy what he described as "administrative independence" from the Pay Board during Phase 2, issuing its own rulings on wage increases in the construction industry.

The constitutional change on local Building & Construction Trades Councils was adopted unanimously. It authorizes the department's executive council or the president acting on its behalf, to "merge or to amalgamate local . . . councils or to modify or to alter their jurisdiction when it deems such action necessary in the interests of the department."

A spokesman for the department said the measure could result in the elimination of as many as 200 of the local councils and would be particularly effective in preventing problems caused by overlapping jurisdictions.

In presenting the resolution to the convention, Sec. Frank Hanley of the laws committee, said its pur-

Hits Policy Guide On Retroactivity

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged that policies adopted by the Pay Board amount to tearing up collective bargaining agreements covering millions of workers and handing over to employers money that "rightfully" belongs to workers.

The board laid down a general rule that most workers cannot recover increases that were denied them during the 90-day wage freeze, from Aug. 16 through Nov. 13.

And it said that future contracts, unless an exception is granted, must not exceed a 5.5 percent annual increase. (Text, Page 2.)

Meany said the action of the "so-called public members" of the Pay Board has "abrogated" contracts and set the stage for "widespread economic instability" during Phase 2 of Pres. Nixon's stabilization program.

The five public members appointed by Nixon lined up with the business members to impose the standards by a 10-5 vote—over the opposition of all five labor members of the Pay Board.

Meany announced that he and other AFL-CIO representatives on the board "will make a full report on the decisions and conduct of the Pay Board sessions" to the federation's Executive Council on Nov. 17, and to the AFL-CIO convention which opens the following day at Bal Harbour, Fla.

The Pay Board's general denial of retroactivity for the freeze period flew in the face of an amendment to the Economic Stabilization Act that had been tentatively approved a few days earlier by the House Banking Committee. The committee had voted to grant payment of the frozen increases unless the Pay

Price Boost Guide Set at 2.5 Percent

Controls that will "rely heavily on voluntary compliance" to hold the average rate of price increases at 2.5 percent have been announced by the Price Commission.

The formula to control prices in Phase 2 of the Administration's economic program will vary according to the size of the firm and the type of industry, the commission said, with no price increases allowed "except those that are justified on the basis of cost increases in effect on or after Nov. 14."

For the nation's largest firms, those with over $100 million a year in annual sales, the justification on the basis of cost increases will have to be proved in advance, through prenotification to the Price Commission.

But all other companies—who handle about 55 percent of total U.S. sales—will be free to raise prices as soon as the freeze ends Saturday, Nov. 13. They are supposed to make no increases that are not based on costs or that will

Rehnquist Opposed For High Court Seat

The AFL-CIO branded William H. Rehnquist a "right-wing zealot" and asked the Senate to reject his nomination to the Supreme Court.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told the Senate Judiciary Committee that labor's opposition is based on Rehnquist's record both before and after joining the Nixon Administration.

As assistant attorney general, Biemiller charged, Rehnquist has been an architect and apologist for a "root and branch assault on the constitutional system of checks and balances."

He has advocated "unbridled executive power," Biemiller said, defended unregulated wiretapping and criticized the Supreme Court in intemperate terms reflecting a hostility to basic constitutional safeguards.

Biemiller charged that Rehnquist was nominated for the Supreme Court solely "because he has demonstrated his complete fealty to the Administration programs—a quality that makes him an attractive servant for the President."

Health Manpower Bills Approved by Congress

Congress sent to the White House a pair of labor-supported bills aimed at overcoming the nation's shortage of doctors, nurses, dentists and other health professionals.

Over a three-year period, the bills authorize $3.7 billion in federal funds—approximately five times the amount of federal aid to medical education over the past three years.

If the money is appropriated and spent, medical, nursing and dental schools would be able to expand their facilities, accept more students, reduce tuition and provide more scholarships for students from low-income families.

The AFL-CIO had testified before both House and Senate committees in support of the two bills. Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said the program was of "vital importance" as a "tooling-up period" to prepare for a national health program.

The legislation was substantially more than the Administration had sought for smaller-scaled programs, but the President is expected to sign the bill. It passed both houses by overwhelming votes. The key test is expected in the funding of the program. Rep. Paul G. Rogers (D-Fla.) told the House he was concerned at reports that the Administration was planning to budget

Congress Urged to End Reliance On Foreign-Flag Tanker Fleets

Continued dependence of the American maritime industry on foreign flag vessels could leave the United States at the mercy of those nations by 1985, Congress was told.

Paul Hall, president of AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., advised a House committee that bills currently before Congress "would arrest the disease that is threatening us with extinction," but that more is needed before the United States becomes dependent on imports to meet its needs in petroleum and natural gas.

Hall's testimony before the House Merchant Marine Committee was presented on behalf of both the Seafarers, of which he is president, and the National Maritime Union, which also represents seamen manning American-flag ships. The total of such jobs has declined from 65,000 in 1966 to less than 32,000 in September of this year.

Hall told the committee that by 1985, the United States will be forced to import—primarily from the Persian Gulf—about 60 percent of its petroleum and 15 to 25 percent of its natural gas. "And in two areas—transportation and home heating—oil and gas will supply 95 percent of the U.S. energy requirements," Hall said.

If the United States allows the continued deterioration of its merchant marine fleet and relies on ships under foreign registry, it will be at the mercy of the policies of those nations for its fuel supply, Hall said. The United States can expect no better treatment than it got during the 1967 Middle East crisis when the Liberian government ordered ships flying its flag not to enter the Gulf of Aqaba.

American firms owned the ships and the U.S. position was insistence on the right of free passage, Hall said, but "the political views of the country of registry proved far more persuasive than did those of the country of ownership." He cited similar examples of ships flying Japanese, Greek and Mexican flags refusing to fulfill contracts for the U.S. Dept. of Defense.

Present U.S. imports of petroleum products are largely handled by 314 tankers owned by a dozen American oil companies, Hall said, "and every one of those ships is under foreign registry." Maritime trade unions have had heated disputes with American oil companies over that before, Hall said, but the time has come for labor, management and government "to develop solutions to both the energy crisis and the crisis of the American-flag merchant marine."

Detailing what ships will be needed to handle oil imports by 1985, Hall called for a 15-year investment of $25 billion in U.S. shipbuilding. The U.S. balance of payments would receive a much-needed boost from such a program, he said.

Of the 222 tankers now under the American flag, Hall said 91 are more than 25 years old, over half are 15 years old and only 14 are as new as five years old. And not one of them is equipped to carry liquid natural gas, he pointed out.

Hall praised the House committee for bills that would provide for American-flag carriage of agricultural goods financed by the U.S. government and required that all government cargo be shipped American "unless there are extreme extenuating circumstances." He asked Congress to write those measures into law rather than leave them as administrative policy.

Hall pledged that U.S. unions and industry would cooperate in improved productivity to keep U.S. costs competitive.

He also proposed that the committee provide legislation to require U.S. manufacturers under government contract to use only materials imported on American flag ships and to exclude any "third flag" nations from commerce between American and other countries, which should split the shipping 50-50.

Hall said that the administrative procedures under any U.S. import quota system also provided a handy vehicle for requiring that half of such imports be handled by U.S. ships.

Census Poll on Freeze Finds Public Dubious

A Census Bureau survey conducted for the Cost of Living Council appears to have backfired on the Nixon Administration.

The survey sought to determine the public's attitude toward the effectiveness and fairness of the first phase of the President's economic program—the 90-day wage-price freeze.

And in an unusual move by a government agency, persons questioned were asked if they were union members. The insertion of this question was widely considered as part of an Administration effort to portray labor's leadership as out of step with rank-and-file members.

As far as effectiveness of the freeze was concerned, a large majority agreed that it had held wages down—better than a 3-1 margin among those with opinions.

But only one-third of those surveyed believed that the freeze had stopped price increases, with 50.6 percent saying it had not and 16 percent unsure.

Among workers as a whole, there was almost an even division between those who thought the freeze applied fairly to all groups and those who disagreed.

But union members, by a substantial plurality, were convinced that the freeze was not fairly applied.

In private industry, only 31.7 percent of union members rated the application of the freeze fair to all groups, while 49.9 percent disagreed and the remainder did not know.

In the government sector, 54.2 percent of union members said the freeze wasn't being fairly applied.

Among all groups questioning the fairness of the freeze, the overwhelming majority considered that it favored big business, manufacturers, rich people and similar categories. Ninety percent saw no benefit to workers, poor people or minorities

The survey found that 25.6 percent of the people questioned, or members of their immediate family, either were denied a pay raise by the freeze or knew that they would be by the end of the 90-day period. Among workers questioned, the figure was 31.2 percent. And among union members, 38.2 percent in private industry and 47.5 percent in the public sector were directly hurt by the pay freeze.

Despite the advance publicity the opinion poll had received, as Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) noted, "no press release was issued on the results" and there was little effort to inform the public of the survey.

Text of Pay Board's Policy Statement

Following is the text of policies governing wage adjustments adopted by the Pay Board, Nov. 8, 1971.

Millions of workers in the nation are looking to the Pay Board for guidance with respect to permissible changes in wages, salaries, various benefits and all other forms of employe total compensation. It is imperative to have a simple standard with as broad a coverage as possible at as early a date as possible. There is probably a need for exceptions and for individual consideration of special situations as soon as practical, and guidance to the millions whose pay relations are relatively simple is an early essential.

This general pay standard is intended, in conjunction with other needed measures, to meet the objectives which led to the establishment of this board.

The general pay standard should be applicable to:

1. Changes that need approval before becoming effective.
2. Changes that must be reported when they become effective.
3. All other changes requiring compliance but not requiring specific approval or reporting.

Effective Nov. 14, 1971, the general pay standard shall be applicable to new labor agreements and, where no labor agreement is in effect, to existing pay practices. The general pay standard would provide:

On and after Nov. 14, 1971, permissible annual aggregate increases would be those normally considered supportable by productivity improvement and cost of living trends. Initially, the general pay standard is established as 5.5 percent. The appropriateness of this figure will be reviewed periodically by the board, taking into account such factors as the long-term productivity trend of 3 percent, cost-of-living trends, and the objective of reducing inflation.

In reviewing new contracts and pay practices, the Pay Board shall consider ongoing collective bargaining and pay practices and the equitable position of the employes involved, including the impact of recent changes in the cost of living upon the employes' compensation.

Existing contracts and pay practices previously set forth will be allowed to operate according to their terms except that specific contracts or pay practices are subject to review, when challenged by a party at interest or by five or more members of the board, to determine whether any increase is unreasonably inconsistent with the criteria established by this board.

In reviewing existing contracts and pay practices, the Pay Board shall consider ongoing collective bargaining and pay practices and the equitable position of the employes involved, including the impact of recent changes in the cost of living upon the employes' compensation.

Scheduled increases in payment for services rendered during the "freeze" of Aug. 16 through Nov. 13, 1971, may be made only if approved by the board in specific cases. The board may approve such payments in cases which are shown to meet any of the following criteria:

(i) Prices were raised in anticipation of wage increases scheduled to occur during the "freeze."

(ii) A wage agreement made after Aug. 15, 1971, succeeded an agreement that had expired prior to Aug. 16, 1971, and retroactivity was an established practice or had been agreed to by the parties.

(iii) Such other criteria as the board may hereafter establish to remedy severe inequities.

Following approval of special procedures by the Pay Board with respect to hearing "prior approval" cases and other special situations, application may be made for an exception to the general pay standard and for a hearing on such matters as inequities and substandard conditions.

No retroactive downward adjustment of rates now being paid will be required by operation of the general pay standard unless the rates were raised in violation of the freeze or of the general pay standard.

Provisions may be considered for vacation plans, in-plant adjustments of wages and salaries, in-grade and length of service increases, payments under compensation plans, transfers and the like.

8 of 10 Plants Fail Safety Test

Nearly eight of every 10 workplaces inspected by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration in the first five months of operation failed to meet federal standards.

Federal inspectors investigated 5,633 establishments, but found only 1,169—or 21 percent—in compliance with the provisions of the job safety law.

The inspections were made between April 28, when the law went into effect, and Oct. 1, Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther reported. Compliance officers uncovered 12,904 violations that led to 2,159 citations against employers.

These inspections involved establishments employing a little over 1 million workers. The job safety law covers 4.1 million workplaces and about 57 million workers.

During the five-month span, employers were assessed a total of $167,346 in penalties for violation of the occupational safety and health standards.

OSHA inspectors also investigated 522 fatal and catastrophic accidents since the law went into effect.

While Guenther's initial report on OSHA operations covers a five-month period, he said that subsequent reports will be issued monthly.

In a month-by-month breakdown of OSHA data, Guenther noted a steady increase in activities by compliance officers.

Convention to Get Report:

Business, 'Public' Units Join To Impose Pay Board Policy

Board found the amount "unreasonably inconsistent" with its guidelines.

Judge George Boldt, chairman of the Pay Board, told newsmen that the board would have to "abide by anything Congress does" but made it clear that he opposes the Banking Committee amendment.

The general standards imposed by the Pay Board provide:

- Increases negotiated or granted after Nov. 13 normally may not exceed 5.5 percent a year.

The board may grant exceptions based on inequities, substandard conditions, and what it termed "ongoing collective bargaining and pay practices" and "the impact of recent changes in the cost of living upon employes' compensation."

The board said it will "periodically" review the 5.5 percent standard, but indicated a hope that the ceiling could be lowered if the cost of living is brought down substantially.

- Pay raises that became due during the 90-day freeze will not be paid for the freeze period except under certain conditions.

The board said retroactive payment may be approved if prices were raised in anticipation of wage increases scheduled to occur during the freeze. And it will consider claims of "severe inequities" under criteria to be developed later.

Also, the board said, payment for the freeze period will be allowed if an agreement replaces a contract that had expired before the freeze period, and retroactivity to the expiration date was an established practice or had been agreed to by the parties.

Thus if a contract had expired on July 1 but agreement on a new contract hadn't been reached until Sept. 1, the full increase could be paid retroactive to July 1—and include the period of the freeze. But if the old contract hadn't expired until Aug. 20, for example, workers wouldn't receive the negotiated increase for the period between Aug. 20 and Nov. 13 unless a special exception was granted by the Pay Board.

- Existing contracts—those negotiated before Nov. 14—will be allowed to operate according to their terms for the Phase 2 period unless challenged by one of the parites, presumably the employer, or by five or more members of the Pay Board.

The challenge could be raised only to an increase that comes due, and not to a rate that had been paid before the freeze. If a challenge is raised, the Pay Board would then determine whether the increase is "unreasonably inconsistent" with its standards.

As an example, assume that workers at the Widget Manufacturing Co. are entitled to a 7 percent pay raise on Dec. 1, in the second year of a contract negotiated by their union.

They will get their raise automatically if no challenge is raised, even though it exceeds the 5.5 percent "standard" for new contracts. If the increase is challenged, the decision is up to the board.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Pay Board was meeting to draft regulations putting its new policies into effect—and lifting the inflexible freeze that has been in effect since Aug. 16.

Meanwhile, the President's Cost of Living Council announced the categories of pay adjustment subject to review. It defined pay adjustment as any general increase in salaries, wages and fringe benefits, either through a collective bargaining agreement or through the action of an employer or group of employers.

- All new adjustments affecting 5,000 or more workers must be approved by the Pay Board before taking effect.

- Pay adjustments affecting between 1,000 and 5,000 employes need not be approved in advance. But they must be reported to the Pay Board at the time they become effective.

- There is no general reporting requirement for pay adjustments affecting fewer than 1,000 employes, but such agreements will be subject to monitoring and spot checks by the Pay Board to see that the standards are not violated.

It was clear that until the Pay Board develops and spells out its procedures, and until some patterns emerge out of the promised "flexibility" of aproach, there will continue to be many unanswered questions.

The courts, as well as Congress, also may have an impact on the program.

The Meat Cutters, for example, announced that the union will carry to the Supreme Court a challenge to the constitutionality of the Economic Stabilization Act, which Nixon invoked as authority for his wage-price freeze and Phase 2 directives. A three-judge lower court rejected the challenge to the President's powers.

In contrast to the sharp disappointment of the labor members at the Pay Board's action, the five business members issued a statement hailing the new standards as "equitable and fair to all."

They expressed "regret that the labor members did not make the vote unanimous."

Before approving the final version, the public and business members put together the same 10-5 majority to reject a labor proposal that, Meany said, "would have established economic stability and curbed inflation . . . the goals Pres. Nixon told the American people he had in mind."

Labor had proposed that all existing contracts be fully honored —including the period covered by the freeze—unless challenged as "unreasonably inconsistent" with the board's standards. That was the position taken by the House Banking Committee.

Furthermore, labor proposed, no challenge could be made to any increase that did not exceed 8 percent.

For new contracts, the labor proposal was a basic 6 percent annual increase as a general standard, with an opportunity to present a case for a higher amount based on inequities and sub-standard conditions.

In a telegram to the Building & Construction Trades Dept. convention, which he was unable to address because of the Pay Board meetings, Meany said the labor members of the board had "acted responsibly, conscious both of their obligations to the workers we represent and to the well-being of America."

Meany reiterated labor's willingness "to sacrifice as much as anyone else as long as that sacrifice is equal and across-the-board."

But Meany made it clear that he did not consider it equality of sacrifice when the Pay Board's denial of retroactivity "took money that was legally and rightfully due workers and put it into the hands of employers."

And he served notice that labor "will not stand still and see our contracts abrogated, our work standards destroyed, our earnings drastically diminished while all around us other sectors of the economy are doing business as usual."

Meany sent a similar telegram to the Metal Trades convention.

Labor's dissatisfaction at the Pay Board decisions is also expected to be voiced at the special convention the Auto Workers had previously scheduled for Nov. 13.

UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock is a member of the Pay Board, along with Meany, Teamsters Pres. Frank E. Fitzsimmons and two AFL-CIO vice presidents—Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel and Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith.

HONORARY LIFE MEMBERSHIPS in the Illinois Labor Historical Society are presented to (second and third from left) Leroy Shackleford, Jr., vice president of the Sleeping Car Porters, and Ulus C. Crowder, a long-time member of the Porters. The presentation was held in the Green Stone Church in Pullman on Chicago's South Side and marked the republication by the ILHS of the labor classic, The Pullman Strike, by W. A. Carwardine. ILHS Pres. Leslie Orear, left, and Prof. Robert Keeley of Roosevelt University are shown presenting the awards.

Price Commission Sets 2.5 Percent Guideline

increase the firm's pre-tax profit margin.

"While price increases, in the aggregate, must not exceed 2.5 percent per year, many adjustments will be below 2.5 percent and some will be above 2.5 percent, as justified on the basis of cost increases and other factors," the commission said in announcing its basic guidelines.

Southern Methodist University Dean C. Jackson Grayson, the chairman of the seven-man commission, said he anticipated that some prices would be increased Monday, Nov, 15, but that he expected a "small surge" at the most.

Grayson said firms would be allowed to anticipate cost increases and raise prices in advance. In the case of the largest firms, which must notify the price commission in advance, the increase may not go into effect until approved by the board. If the commission does not respond within 30 days, the firm may go ahead with the price increase.

The commission will use different formulas in approving increases in four sectors—manufacturing; wholesalers, retailers and similar commercial enterprises; service industries and professions and others.

Retail firms are instructed to post their freeze period prices by Jan. 1, 1972 but Grayson said the list could be "representative" rather than a complete list.

In the "others" category, rents will remain frozen until the commission develops specific guidelines. Regulated industries must also report to the commission which may impose more stringent standards than those invoked by other regulatory bodies.

In no case, Grayson emphasized, may a price be increased to take into account revenue lost during the freeze period. In the case of windfall profits, such as from wage increases not paid during the freeze period, the commission said it will ask the firm to roll back prices.

The division of companies into three categories by annual sales volume was announced earlier by the Cost of Living Council, with the top category for firms with over $100 million in annual sales.

Companies with sales between $50 million and $100 million will not need advance permission to increase prices, but will be required to make quarterly reports to the government on profits and price changes. All companies with smaller sales volume would not have to report increases and would be subject only to "spot checks" by the Internal Revenue Service.

The Cost of Living Council also announced specific exemptions from Phase 2 controls for many consumer products, including all those exempted from the earlier, 90-day freeze.

In addition, the council announced a long list of other exemptions, including used products such as houses, cars and appliances. Similarly exempted were unimproved land, custom-made clothing, furs, jewelry and many types of art work, including antiques.

In separate categories, the council said that dues to non-profit organizations, royalties, taxes, alimony, welfare and workmen's compensation would also be exempted.

Just before the council announced the categories and exemptions on Phase 2 prices, the AFL-CIO reported to the Cost of Living Council that widespread violations and evasions of the freeze during Phase 1 made a "tragic farce" of the program.

Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services and head of the federation's nationwide "watchdog" committees, said that complaints have been received from every part of the country on a wide variety of products "ranging from candy bars to automobile insurance."

In addition, Perlis said, many merchants and landlords are "artfully evading" the freeze by reducing services, lowering quality, eliminating sales and lower-priced merchandise, deferring leases, mixing grades and fabricating "new" items at higher prices.

"In the absence of adequate federal law enforcement and compliance machinery, consumers have been, during the last 90 days, at the mercy of a free-wheeling marketplace," he charged.

To prevent a repetition of this situation during Phase 2, he called on the commission to provide for:

- Extension of price-control coverage to many items not now covered and the closing of all loopholes.
- Mandatory posting of prefreeze price lists.
- Creation of adequate compliance and law-enforcement machinery.
- Prompt processing of complaints.
- Elimination of secrecy from the processing of violations.
- Restitution of overcharges.
- Development of a more realistic system of penalties.

Wurf Scores Handling Of Emergency Jobs Plan

The State, County & Municipal Employes, whose members are directly affected by the Emergency Employment Act of 1971, have complained to Congress that the Labor Dept. has "distorted" and "perverted" the intent of the act in providing jobs and improving public services.

AFSCME Pres. Jerry Wurf told a House subcommittee that the program is being used in many cases against public workers who have been fired and for political advantage by state governors into whose hands the Labor Dept. has placed major authority.

Wurf noted that AFSCME had supported the original legislation "as an important first step toward the achievement of a long-range program to help meet the nation's need for public services." Instead, he declared, the Nixon Administration has imposed state control over the management and the funds for the program.

He particularly resented the bypassing of congressional provisions calling for consultation with union representatives at the local and state levels.

By limiting the flow of funds directly from Washington to cities of more than 75,000 population and by siphoning off a portion of local funds on the basis of the proportion of state employes in the local area, the Labor Dept. has given a "substantial amount of control over funds to the governors," Wurf told the subcommittee. These guidelines "give the governors enormous political leverage and are being used that way," he said.

Labor Dept. guidelines "grossly discriminate against state and local government workers who have been laid off," Wurf said. To qualify as an "unemployed worker" eligible to be hired with EEA money, laid-off public employes must have been jobless for at least four weeks, whereas other workers need be unemployed only one week to be eligible, Wurf noted.

Mr. Rehnquist's Failings

THE AFL-CIO opposes the confirmation of William H. Rehnquist as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. We do so because Mr. Rehnquist's public record demonstrates . . . that he has been one of the prime theoreticians of, and apologists for, this Administration's root and branch assault on the constitutional system of checks and balances.

The central aim of this Administration is the achievement of unbridled executive power. That is the lesson of its insistence on the right to engage in unregulated and unreviewable wiretapping in what it regards as "domestic security" cases; its attempts to downgrade the Senate's role in the process of judicial confirmation; its refusals to utilize the $12 billion Congress appropriated to stimulate the economy; its efforts to act unilaterally to breathe new life into the Subversive Activities Control Board; and its campaign to intimidate the press culminating in the Pentagon papers litigation, to name just the instances out of many more that come most forcefully to mind. And during all of this, Mr. Rehnquist has been the "President's lawyer's lawyer."

The executive drive for dominance has created, and will continue to create, constitutional confrontations of the first magnitude. The court is the final arbitrator in those confrontations.

It is empowered to decide whether the executive will be rebuffed again when it overreaches, as it was in the Pentagon papers litigation, or whether the Administration will receive judicial sanction in its campaign to subordinate both legislative authority and individual freedoms. There is no place on a tribunal with these responsibilities for a justice who is dedicated to principles opposite to those of the Constitution.

THERE WAS A HEAVY BURDEN on Mr. Rehnquist to demonstrate to this committee that his service on the Supreme Court would be consistent with the basic constitutional system. The burden of justifying his appointment was particularly great in light of the background of his nomination. For five weeks before Mr. Rehnquist's name was submitted, the Administration had floated trial balloons culminating in a list of six persons which caused dismay among the general public and in the entire legal profession.

Yet, when Mr. Rehnquist was given an opportunity to explain his basic constitutional philosophy by careful inquiry by members of this committee, he did not grasp the opportunity despite the fact that in 1959 he had argued "The only way for the Senate to learn of a nominee's constitutional views is to 'inquire of men on their way to the Supreme Court something of their views on these questions.' "

Instead he chose to fence with the senators, and when this proved too transparent an evasion, hid behind a spurious claim of privilege. The proposition advanced was that Mr. Rehnquist could not answer the senators' questions because he might reveal advice that he had given to the President. It is clear that this claim was merely opportunistic, because when it suited his purpose Mr. Rehnquist did describe advice he had given to the President.

We oppose Mr. Rehnquist on the ground that he does not know what the Constitution is all about. We rest on this ground because the President has proclaimed that ideological conformity with his constitutional views was his guiding consideration. That being so it must also be a guiding consideration in the Senate. For the President should not be allowed to staff the Supreme Court as he would a Republican political caucus.

A Word Edgewise:

New Book a Clinical Analysis Of RFK as Attorney General

By John P. Roche

VICTOR S. NAVASKY has written an intriguing account of Robert F. Kennedy's tenure as Attorney General. "Kennedy Justice" (Atheneum) is a hard book to categorize. Predictably, it infuriated both those who looked on the late senator as a presumptuous kid and their opposites who believed he could walk on the water.

Navasky displays no emotional commitment as he coldly and carefully explores Kennedy's record at the Dept. of Justice; he simply conducts a clinical exercise on the degree to which Kennedy's performance symbolized the mix between idealism and expediency that typified Pres. John F. Kennedy's Administration.

Perhaps the most interesting thread that runs through the book is the manner in which Atty. Gen. Kennedy evolved a modus non vivendi with his alleged subordinate, FBI Director John Edgar Hoover. Although, because his brother sat in the Oval Office, Robert Kennedy was unquestionably the most powerful Attorney General in American history, there was no effort to tackle Hoover head-on.

Instead of going outside the bureaucratic system to force Hoover to get involved in such crucial problems as organized crime or the protection of civil rights workers in the South—where Kennedy would clearly have held the advantage—the Attorney General opted to engage in inside pressure, essentially bureaucratic blackmail. When he did this, as Navasky amply documents, he chose to fight with Hoover's weapons and the latter consistently won on points. The director's most telling victory was, of course, the legitimization of wiretapping and bugging.

On the other hand, Navasky gives Kennedy full credit for the new spirit, the elan, that came with him to the murky corridors of the Justice Dept.; and for the quality of the staff that he brought with him, trusted implicitly, and turned loose on the overriding issue of destroying the legal foundations of white supremacy in the South. One also gets a sense of the man's demonic vigor in the war against Jimmy Hoffa and the effort to cripple the operations of criminal syndicates. Who but Kennedy's staff would have thought of using the old Mann Act mousetrap to make it a federal offense to send proceeds of illegal gambling operations across a state line?

The aspect of "Kennedy Justice" that has brought Bobby's fans out screaming is Navasky's suggestion that the department was dominated by what I have called "technocratic liberalism," a dedication to technique rather than to ideals.

If Kennedy turned on the machine to help civil rights, he also cranked it up to "get" Jimmy Hoffa. And his record suggests that he could easily have programmed it to root out "subversives." He was indeed like a superb computer waiting to be programmed. Efficiency was his code word. I recall his savage contempt at my "softness" when I suggested that even Mafiosi have constitutional rights.

LAST SUMMER Murray Kempton related a story that beautifully documents Navasky's thesis. Vice Pres. Lyndon Johnson wanted to give the President his counsel on how to handle the civil rights campaign, but was shunted off to one of Robert Kennedy's deputies. Johnson, Kempton reported, wanted the President to go south and speak for civil rights and tell the country that it is intolerable that Negroes suffer such discrimination.

Quoting the Deputy Attorney General's account, Kempton continued: "The Vice President reached out and grabbed the flag and he said 'A man can be on his way to die for this country and he can't get a cup of coffee in a restaurant. The President has got to tell the people that. Nobody's ever put the thing on a moral, emotional basis. Let's talk about God, and morality and goodness and simple justice and patriotism and get that involved in the thing.' "

The Deputy Attorney General was probably a bit embarrassed at this cornball stuff—computers don't wave flags—but eventually moralism, not efficiency, broke the back of white supremacy.

Best Hope for Leadership:

'72 Looms as Time of Testing For Labor-Liberal Coalition

The following is excerpted from "Labor and Liberals: A New Focus," by Tom Kahn in the November 1971 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

ECONOMIC JUSTICE—whereby any and all peoples have a fair and equal access to the fruits of the nation's productive capacity—is not only the moral obligation of a democratic society, it is also an essential ingredient of a well-functioning economy. It is also the central purpose of the labor movement.

At some points in recent years, that purpose of the labor movement was considered quaintly old-fashioned, if not obsolete, by those who viewed labor's pursuit of higher wages and worker benefits as largely "irrelevant" to the great moral and social issues of our time. Some even portrayed this pursuit as an assault on the poor.

But today, the American economy, has had 2½ years of steady decline, not as an accident of some cyclical evolution of economic history, but as the conscious plan of an Administration which offers a direct challenge to the principles of economic justice.

As a result, the attention paid to the national economy has brought organized labor to the forefront in what could yet be the revitalization of a progressive political coalition. In that sense, there is an opportunity for labor and its allies to draw into sharp focus their differences with the conservative bloc which currently controls the White House. But this is also a perilous time, in which the stakes are high both for the future of that progressive coalition and, more importantly, for the day-to-day well-being of low- and middle-income America.

So a future writer, with a labor point of view and some slight poetic exaggeration, might begin a description of the first 2 years, 10 months of Richard Nixon's presidency by saying with Charles Dickens, "It was the best of times . . . It was the worst of times."

It has been a dismal and mean-spirited presidency, lacking altogether in compassion, justice and elementary fair play. Since Nixon entered the White House, virtually every critical problem plaguing our national life has been underscored and intensified. None has been solved; few have been relieved; many have multiplied. Our social needs mount while large chunks of our productive capacity lie wastefully idle; and the costs of our stagnation are borne by millions of Americans whose misery is all the worse for being absolutely unnecessary. If it is not the worst of times, it is nonetheless a bleak time.

Yet it is also a time when the labor movement has been confounding its critics, who long ago wrote it off as moribund, with demonstrations of a new dynamism and growth. The last few months in particular have witnessed an upsurge of labor unity, born of a determination to resist and overturn the policies of this Administration.

If it is not the best of times, it is nonetheless a time for hope—and hard work, struggle and rededication to the great goals of the American labor movement.

It is the failures of the Nixon Administration that give shape to the challenge that labor must meet in the year ahead.

It would be too easy, and wrong, to blame all of our domestic ills on the Nixon Administration. They are the outgrowth of cumulative neglect in the midst of rapid technological and social change. Of course, this Administration did not invent slums or poverty or the maldistribution of our wealth or racial inequality or the crisis in mass transit or the decay of public facilities or air pollution or the inadequacy of our health care system or crime in the streets.

But at a time when the American people were coming increasingly to recognize these problems and to cry out for answers, it can be said of this Administration that it used the powers of government, not to solve these problems, but to exacerbate them. This it has done through a colossal mismanagement of the national economy.

PERHAPS WHEN all is said and done, historians will look back on the 1960s and 1970s and conclude that the greatest challenge to American democracy came from the increasing concentration of wealth in the hands of a few.

This concentration, accelerated in the 1960s by the greatest wave of conglomerate mergers in American history, has profound and far-reaching implications for collective bargaining, for community life and for the very processes of political democracy. And part of this wave has been the spread of multinational corporations with their serious impact on trade.

The development in recent years of new techniques in coordinated collective bargaining—which proved so successful in the General Electric strike—represents one line of defense by the labor movement against the unprecedented power of corporate conglomerates.

Still, the nation as a whole has not yet grasped the full meaning of this concentration. This is a battle that merits and requires the informed support of the entire liberal community.

In 1972 the economic issues will loom large as the American people go to the polls. This will be a time of testing for all who believe in social and economic democracy—for all who believe in the common man, in his capacity for self-government and in his inherent right to a fair share of our nation's abundance.

In recent years, the common man has got short shrift—from an elite that abandoned him for more fashionable crusades and from an Administration utterly alien to his needs and openly hostile to his interests. The labor movement remains the one social force to voice his aspirations.

The mobilization of the labor movement and all of its allies in the liberal community, black and white, is the common man's best hope for a new President in 1972—and for the kind of leadership he needs.

Phase 2 Controls Loose:

Price Watchdog Effort Enlists Support of Community Groups

PRES. NIXON'S Phase 2 price controls will be little more than "frosting on Mr. Connally's corporate cake" because they lack tight rules and the means to enforce them, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis charged.

Perlis said that the AFL-CIO's nationwide watchdog operation of local and regional price monitoring committees, launched by Federation Pres. George Meany when Phase 2 was announced, is ready to start filling the price control enforcement gap when Phase 2 goes into effect.

"We invite all citizens to join with us—all consumers—in an open-ended campaign" to make Phase 2 price controls work to protect workers and consumers, whose wages will be closely controlled by both government and their employers," Perlis declared. He made the statements on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Perlis, who is coordinating the price watchdog effort, said the community-wide monitoring committees will form subcommittees to keep close tabs on such specific segments of local business as food stores, hospitals, nursing homes and health care, and housing and rentals. He said that plans also include meetings with local businessmen in order to obtain their cooperation, self-policing and regulation.

It would be much better if "the businessmen of this country take it to heart and enforce price control themselves," he asserted. But, he added, "our experience over the years has shown . . . that very rarely happens."

A full operation for "enforcement is absolutely essential," he said, noting that even with an OPA force of 76,000 during World War II, "there were all kinds of shenanigans," including "black-marketeering . . . selling and re-selling ration coupons . . . 'five-percenters' " and other "under-the-counter nonsense."

By Press Associates, Inc.

LAST FEBRUARY, Pres. Nixon, in his national health message to Congress, declared war on cancer . . . but just how this war will be waged has become a prime issue.

"The time has now come," Nixon said, "to put more of our resources into cancer research and—learning an important lesson from our space program—to organize these resources as effectively as possible. . . ."

He asked for an additional $100 million for cancer research and said he would ask for more later. The Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare was asked to draw up a new "Cancer Conquest" program.

An Administration bill was introduced proposing the establishment of such a program, theoretically within the National Institute of Health. Realistically, though, the program would be outside NIH since the program would be administered by a director appointed by the President and reporting directly to him.

After hearings in March, the Senate subcommittee on Health came up with a bill compromising most of the differences with the Administration. A major point of the compromise is that the President would still name the director of the independent agency within NIH, but it would require Senate confirmation.

The compromise passed the Senate by 79-1 on July 7. The one opposition vote was cast by Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.). His position was that "nobody has explained how an independent institute enhances or improves the program for the conquest of cancer."

Nelson's view may not have received any support in the Senate but it fell on far more sympathetic ears in the House. The Public Health & Environment subcommittee unanimously reported out a bill which in part called for:

- Coordination of all NIH activities relating to cancer into a national program with the National Cancer Institute at NIH as the focal point.
- The directors of the Cancer Institute, Heart & Lung Institute and the National Institute of Neurological Diseases & Strokes would also serve as associate directors of NIH. They would report to the director of NIH rather than directly to the President.
- A budget of $1.59 billion would be authorized for fiscal years 1972, 1973, and 1974.

The House is expected to approve this proposal shortly and the issue will be joined. In addition to far greater funding in the House bill, there is a fundamental difference in approach: Can and should a crash program against cancer be divorced from other related medical research?

MEDICAL OPINION is divided on both the Senate and House measures and it is divided, too, on just how close we are to a breakthrough in the dreaded disease.

The expectation is that the final provisions of a national cancer bill will be decided by a House-Senate conference committee. The issue may not have created sensational headlines, but cancer research has become a critical goal and a critical issue.

No administration and no political party has a monopoly on the fight against cancer.

It was in 1937 that a whole new concept of federal public health was initiated under the New Deal when the National Cancer Act was passed. It established the National Cancer Institute to carry on research, train personnel in cancer work and to make grants for research.

Although pressures for intensified research into the causes and cures for cancer continued to build up, it was former Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.), chairman of the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee, who launched the initial campaign in 1970.

Both the Administration and Congress seem to have given such a priority to that goal—in their own ways.

LACKING TIGHT rules and stiff enforcement, Pres. Nixon's Phase 2 price controls will be little more than "frosting on Mr. Connally's corporate cake," AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis, center, charged on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine.

Florida Council Support Aids New Tax Plan

Jacksonville, Fla.—A strong endorsement of a state tax reform proposal by the Florida AFL-CIO's 15th annual convention helped push the issue across in the Nov. 2 election.

Voters cast 70 percent of their ballots in favor of Gov. Reubin Askew's program to tax corporate profits in the state. Corporations have been operating on a virtually tax-free basis throughout Florida.

The 396 delegates voted overwhelming support of the tax reform program to offset the well-financed scare campaign staged by corporations before the election.

The convention also condemned Pres. Nixon's new economic game plan for its failure to freeze corporate profits and interest rates while imposing a severe burden on workers. Delegates called for equal sacrifice in all sectors of the economy.

Four new members were elected to the state federation's executive board. They are: Charles R. Getchel, Laborers, of the Lakeland district; Donald L. Carter, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Daytona district; Herb Sully, Communications Workers, Orlando district, and Bill McCreary, Sheet Metal Workers, Tampa district. The board is made up of the federation's three executive officers, three at-large members and 12 members from congressional districts.

Federation Pres. Charlie Harris reported an over-the-year increase of 5,000 members in the state body, raising the membership to 80,000.

The top officers of the state body were not up for re-election at the convention. Sec.-Treas. William E. Allen and Vice Pres. Art Hallgren continue to serve with Harris.

Leading speakers at the four-day convention included Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.), Sen. Fred R. Harris (D-Okla.), Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) and Gov. Askew (D).

MERGER AGREEMENT of the Lithographers & Photoengravers with the Bookbinders is sealed with a handshake by IBB Sec.-Treas. Wesley A. Taylor, left, and LPIU Pres. Kenneth J. Brown. In the center are IBB Vice Presidents Joseph Hellman and William Stasiak. The merger action was approved at the LPIU convention in New Orleans with 97 percent of the voters in favor. The agreement will be put up for final ratification in referendum votes of the two unions' members.

West Virginia Labor Presses Tax Reform

Charleston, W.Va.—Delegates to the 8th convention of the West Virginia AFL-CIO adopted a program aimed at upgrading the state's tax laws to make them "equitable, stable and adequate."

Specifically, the 405 delegates approved a resolution calling for reduction of the sales tax on consumers, removal of personal property from taxable items, and shifting the tax burden to more equitable sources.

The delegates voted down a resolution calling for immediate abolition of surface mining on the state and national level. Following a brief but emotional floor discussion, a resolution was passed granting the executive board authority to investigate and determine what position the state AFL-CIO should take on strip mining.

Of 54 resolutions offered, the convention approved 53 including measures calling for the establishment of "no-fault" automobile insurance in West Virginia and supporting passage of the Kennedy-Griffiths National Health Security bill.

The delegates also soundly endorsed a resolution calling for strict enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1970. The convention condemned the Dept. of Labor's effort to dilute the significance of the act by "permitting the states to adopt standards less stringent than those contained in the federal law." It noted that the first citation issued under the act was in West Virginia following pressure on the Labor Dept. from a Moundsville local of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Another resolution calls for changes in the state workmen's compensation law to give an injured worker 66⅔ percent of his own weekly wage instead of the average weekly wage in the state. The resolution also urged steps to bring claims filed prior to 1961 up to the current level.

Other resolutions urged government reinsurance of pension funds, improvements to the national economy, passage of the Hartke-Burke Foreign Trade Act of 1972, a call for early retirement and increased benefits under social security.

Members of area COPE Women's Activities Departments in the state were honored for contributing a total of 116,748 volunteer hours since 1959.

Backed by Assessment:

Lithographers Push Organizing Drive

New Orleans—The Lithographers & Photoengravers are ready to launch a massive organizing campaign that will be financed by a $5 assessment of members.

Approval of the organizing drive came at the fourth biennial convention of the LPIU after delegates overwhelmingly approved a proposal for merger with the Bookbinders to form the new Graphic Arts International Union.

The assessment, however, must get final approval in a referendum of members next January when officers and board members will also be elected.

Keyed to the organizing effort, termed the "most ambitious" ever undertaken by the union, will be the expansion of the organizing staff from four to nine full-time organizers. The convention also approved establishment of full-time staff positions of legislative director and technological director.

Major changes and developments in union crafts require the services of a full-time technological director to maintain job training and upgrading programs to assure job security, the union noted. It also stressed the need of a legislative representative to promote union programs in Congress.

All of the top officers of the LPIU were nominated for re-election without opposition. Two incumbent Lithographer division vice presidents are being contested in the January elections and a two-way race also has developed for a Photoengraver division vice presidency, which became vacant with the recent death of Walter F. Risdon.

In the Litho division, Vice Pres. Gus Petrakis is being opposed by William A. Schroeder, LPIU education director, and Vice Pres. Theodore Brandt faces Edward V. Donohue of Minneapolis-St. Paul. Both incumbents have been in office 11 years.

In the Engravers division, Norman P. Park of Detroit is opposing John R. Gabbard of Cincinnati.

Among the major resolutions adopted, delegates called for early passage of the National Health Security bill now before Congress, effective implementation and enforcement of the new Occupational Safety & Health Act, increased union activity in voter registration programs leading to the 1972 presidential elections, and a total pull-out of U.S. forces from Southeast Asia by next June 1.

Of the 252 delegates, only eight voted against merger with the Bookbinders earlier in the six-day convention. If approved in referendum votes of the two unions' membership, the action would bring together 70,000 bookbinders, including 11,000 retired members, and 60,000 lithographers and photoengravers, with 6,000 on the retirement rolls.

Delegates instructed officers of the LPIU to continue to explore the possibility of merger with other graphic arts unions. The union also extended an invitation to 8,000 New York City lithographers, who had seceded from the union when the LPIU was formed in 1964, to reaffiliate.

Delaware Unions Urge Full Payment of Wages

Dover, Del.—The nearly 300 delegates to the 15th annual convention of the Delaware AFL-CIO called upon Congress to develop economic programs that will "guarantee the effectiveness of whatever controls may be deemed necessary" for the American economy.

In a convention resolution aimed at Phase 2 of the President's new economic policy, delegates insisted "that all monies that have been withheld from workers under labor agreements be ordered paid at once, retroactive to the appropriate effective date."

Delegates also denounced what they termed an "effort to destroy the credibility of the Bureau of Labor Statistics" on the part of the Nixon Administration. "This attempt . . . to hoodwink and propagandize the American public can result only in erasing future credibility of both the BLS and the Administration," the convention declared.

The resolution referred to recent shakeups in BLS personnel, coupled with suspension of reports on unemployment in urban ghettos plus suspension of press briefings on unemployment and Consumer Price Index figures.

The BLS situation was one of the major subjects of an address to the delegates by state federation Pres. Harold T. Bockman.

The convention re-elected 29 incumbent executive board members and chose three new members, Wallace Bennett, Dario Recchiuti and Dave Seufert. Bockman and Sec.-Treas. Charles C. Lemon were not up for election this year.

COPE Director Al Barkan urged delegates to begin making all-out preparations for the 1972 political campaign, pointing out that labor is paying the price now for defeat in 1968.

Other speakers included John A. Sessions, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Robert M. McGlotten, executive director of the federation's Human Resources Development Institute, and J. Thomas Schranck, president of the Delaware Building & Construction Trades Council.

Unionist Named to Health Cost Panel

John F. Tomayko, insurance director for the Steelworkers, is the lone labor member of two advisory committees named by the President to advise the Cost of Living Council on Phase 2 matters involving state and local government salaries and health costs.

Tomayko was named to the 20-member health panel along with three insurance executives and four medical businessmen, including the president of the American Pharmaceutical Manufacturing Assn.

The 17-member panel on state and local government salaries includes two governors, one insurance executive and the president of the National Education Association.

Metal Trades Repel Raid at Navy Yard

Kittery, Me.—Workers at the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard here voted decisively to keep the AFL-CIO Federal Employes Metal Trades Council as their bargaining agent.

An attempted raid by the unaffiliated National Federation of Federal Employes was rebuffed by a vote of 1,289 to 987, with only 98 "no union" ballots.

It was the second victory in less than two weeks for affiliates of the Metal Trades Dept. Earlier, the Metal Trades Council at the Norfolk, Va., Naval Shipyard defeated the unaffiliated National Association of Government Employes by a margin of more than 2 to 1.

Kansas Delegates Map Major Campaign for '72

Wichita, Kan.—A series of "town hall" meetings focusing on the bread-and-butter issues of the 1972 elections and labor's political action programs will be staged throughout the state by the Kansas AFL-CIO.

The project got the unanimous support of the 350 delegates to the state federation's convention. They urged all local unions to voluntarily initiate a 1-cent a month assessment of members to finance the meetings.

Executive Sec.-Treas. Ralph McGee reported that five pilot town hall meetings held before the convention met with an overwhelmingly favorable response. The future meetings will be used to establish COPE committees and develop voter registration activities, besides stimulating discussion of election issues.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) set the political theme for the convention as he charged that the nation was shaken and confused by the Nixon Administration's Phase 2 economic program.

Jackson called for the start of "Phase 3—the phasing out of Richard Nixon as President." This should be followed, he said, with "Phase 4 in November 1972 by electing a Democratic President."

The convention adopted several resolutions dealing with abuses in automobile insurance coverage. It called for state legislation to provide for both group auto insurance and "no-fault" insurance to combat the high costs, poor service and discrimination that presently affects policyholders.

Related resolutions demanded an investigation of the "insurance fiasco" in Kansas and proposed increasing the premium tax paid by insurance companies from 2 to 3 percent.

Other resolutions proposed:

- Legislation to allow agency shop clauses in labor contracts.
- A coordinated organizing program directed by the state federation and the national AFL-CIO.
- Enactment of an anti-strikebreaker law.
- Improved state and federal inspection of nursing homes.

Two new members were elected to the executive board. They are Ralph Angle of the Meat Cutters, Kansas City, and Vernon Welling of the State, County & Municipal Employes, Topeka.

Kansas City Labor On the Air Daily

Kansas City—A five-minute radio news program covering union activities and labor affairs locally and nationally is being broadcast by the Greater Kansas City Missouri Central Labor Council.

The program, "Labor News Today," is aired each afternoon over radio station KBIL, which is donating the time to the labor council. Broadcasts are handled by Tom Lynch, a reporter for the Kansas City Labor Beacon newspaper.

The council reported that the program, on the air since Aug. 2, has been praised widely.

To Resist Non-Union Construction:

Building Trades Delegates Act to Strengthen Councils

pose is "to improve the efficiency of the councils in order to meet our current problems, including the growth of non-union construction, by vesting the necessary power in the executive council."

"Action can be taken to meet many of the problems which have confronted the councils, such as inadequate financing and partial participation by local unions," Hanley said.

The measure also empowers the executive council to issue rules governing "the conduct, activities, affairs, finances and property" of the local councils, plus disciplinary procedures and guidelines for retirement benefits for full-time officers where feasible.

The problem of non-union construction was echoed in the keynote address of Pres. Frank Bonadio, who told delegates that while there may be no authoritative figures available, "We have every reason to believe that non-union construction work has been growing considerably."

"It is our task to keep this work within appropriate limits if the standard of living of the union worker is not to be destroyed in this industry," Bonadio said.

Bonadio and Sec.-Treas. Robert A. Georgine were elected to their first, full four-year terms, and the salaries of the top officers were increased by $2,500 each to $40,000 for the president and $35,000 for the secretary-treasurer. They were named to their current posts on the retirement last May of the late C. J. Haggerty.

The 10 vice presidents who make up the department's executive council serve two-year terms. A new member of the council is Pres. Martin J. Ward of the Plumbers & Pipefitters, who was named to fill the vacancy left by the retirement of Peter T. Schoemann, president emeritus of the same union.

Bonadio also spoke on other problems confronting the building trades such as minorities, the Davis-Bacon Act and wage controls.

Citing Labor Dept. figures that show 12 percent of the current group entering apprenticeship programs represent minorities, Bonadio said, "we must continue our efforts to bring minorities into the building and construction trades in a proper manner and to fight attacks on our procedures such as the apprenticeship system and the hiring hall."

He warned that the same forces that pressed for the suspension of the Davis-Bacon Act will now press for "administration of its provisions in such manner as to weaken its protection of fair wage rates." He said the building trades must be on the alert with respect to Labor Dept. procedures and provide the evidence necessary "to sustain our position in individual cases."

On the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee—which was continued by presidental executive order during Phase 2—Bonadio said "we shall insist upon intelligent and reasonable application of the general criteria to the special and unique facts of the building and construction industry."

The chairman of that committee, Dunlop, indicated in his address that he believed "decisions by the committee will be final" during Phase 2 and that "parties will not be able to appeal our decisions to the Pay Board."

"This industry should continue at a craft board level, and at a (stabilization) committee level," so that individual case-by-case problems are handled by persons familiar with the industry's "special characteristics and peculiarities," Dunlop said.

But he qualified his remarks by saying "this independence . . . will have to conform to certain broad policy guidelines, which we will have to discuss with the Pay Board."

"I have some doubts whether the generalized rules which they develop and announce will be directly applicable to the special conditions in this industry. And we may need some special arrangement to apply rules which do not make sense here."

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director Donald Slaiman told delegates that the latest Labor Dept. figures show that Outreach Programs have recruited more than 12,000 apprentices from minority groups.

Ninety percent of these were in the building trades, Slaiman reported, and 62 percent were in the following trades: electricians, plumbers and pipe fitters, carpenters, sheet metal, iron and elevator constructors.

"That is mostly the trades that people use to yell about that the doors were closed and nobody could get in," Slaiman said.

"I think it is important that people know this record," he said, "not because the building trades need a kind word now and then instead of the usual stuff, but because I think everyone in the government, in the public, in the minority community ought to know of their works.

"We shouldn't have to go through the rigmarole of seeking the answer to minority employment in reducing standards or thinking that putting a quota on a piece of paper is the answer to permanent jobs with skills."

One resolution adopted by the delegates put the convention on record as "vigorously opposed to the unsound administration" of executive orders to prevent discrimination in employment and training "by means of the Philadelphia-type plans."

Among other speakers were Pres. R. H. Semon of the Florida Building Trades, Pres. Paul J. Burnsky of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., Pres. Paul Hall of the Maritime Trades Dept., Sec.-Treas. Edward P. Murphy of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept,. Director Robert McGlotten of the Human Resources Development Institute, Deputy COPE Director Joseph Rourke, BCTD Gen. Counsel Louis Sherman, under Sec. of Labor Laurence Silberman, Assistant Labor Sec. William J. Usery, and Chairman William J. Cour of the National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes in the construction industry.

CHARLTON HESTON, right, outgoing president of the Screen Actors, receives the union's annual award "for outstanding achievement in fostering the finest ideals of the acting profession." New Pres. John Gavin presents the award to Heston, who served as president since 1965, the longest tenure in the guild's history.

Gavin Succeeds Heston In Screen Actors' Post

Hollywood, Calif.—Newly-elected Screen Actors Pres. John Gavin has announced a program of full-time legal service within the union and close cooperation with other unions to protect members' rights in re-runs of their work.

Gavin was elected to a one-year term by a vote of 6,407 to 3,237 over Bert Freed, who headed a slate of 20 candidates for all union offices. The Gavin slate, which carried the endorsement of the union's nominating committee, swept all offices.

Gavin was installed as president at the annual membership meeting attended by 1,000 actors at the Palladium, Nov. 7. He succeeds Charlton Heston, who first served on the Screen Actors board in 1960 and had been elected to six one-year terms as president since 1965.

Heston was given the union's annual "outstanding achievement" award for distinctive community service. It marked the first time the award has been given to an individual for service as a Screen Actors' officer as well as the normal "good citizenship" contribution.

Gavin told the meeting that the new legal service would be used to press unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation claims of the actors. He also announced a system of policing residuals through monitoring of all TV uses of commercials, episodes and features to insure proper payment to actors.

He expressed concern over foreign undercutting in the cassette, community antenna TV and pay TV industries and pledged unity with fellow unions in preserving workers' rights. A legislative review of methods to increase U.S. motion picture production will also be undertaken and Gavin re-affirmed the Screen Actors' commitment to minority group employment.

The union's financial report on the year closing Oct. 31 showed that a record $17.3 million in residuals had been received by the union and paid out to members, $13.2 million of it from domestic showings of TV programs. A total of $137 million has now been paid since the first TV residuals were received in 1953.

Elected with Gavin to national offices were Vice Presidents Ed Platt, Robert Lansing, Robert Easton and Joyce Gordon; Recording Sec. Kathleen Freeman and Treas. Gilbert Perkins.

Elected to three-year terms on the board of directors were Frank Aletter, Whit Bissell, Ann Doran, Joe Flynn, Ena Hartman, Rodolfo Hoyos, Victor Jory, Jack Kruschen, Monte Markham, Mercedes McCambridge, Ed Nelson, Walter Pidgeon, William Reynolds and Ray Teal. Two others, Fritz Feld and Dennis Weaver, were elected to one-year terms on the board.

Rehnquist Hit As Unsuitable For High Court

And if confirmed, Biemiller warned, he will sit on the court as "the Administration's man," mocking the court's role as an equal and independent branch of government.

"As the labor movement is all too acutely aware from its initial experiences with the Pay Board," Biemiller noted, "nothing is more destructive of the peoples' confidence than officials, who have an obligation to the public, but who view themselves as an extension of the Executive, responsible to its interests rather than the public interest."

As for Rehnquist's record before entering the Administration, his only expressed concern for individual freedom appears to have been when the city council of Phoenix, Ariz., was considering a public accommodations law.

His concern, Biemiller noted, was that the freedom of a businessman to choose his customers and discriminate at will would be violated. That argument, he said, is "so far outside the mainstream of constitutional thought that it was unanimously rejected by the Supereme Court" when it sustained the constitutionality of the public accommodations section of the 1964 federal Civil Rights Act.

Terming Rehnquist's views those of an extremist, Biemiller urged rejection of the nomination "just as the nomination of William Kunstler, an extremist of the left, should be rejected if it were made."

State AFL-CIO Councils Summoned To Insist on Strong Job Safety Laws

Organized labor is ready to fight the battle for effective job safety legislation all over again in the state legislatures.

Although Congress enacted a strong federal Occupational Safety & Health Act, the Labor Dept. has issued guidelines for state job safety programs that do not meet the federal standards from labor's viewpoint.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a letter to all state and local central labor bodies, called for the defeat of any state job safety measures that do not meet the basic protections of the federal law.

Labor job safety experts had protested vigorously the Labor Dept.'s initial proposal setting the conditions for eligibility of state plans under the federal act.

Despite changes in the final rule, Meany said, "it remains subject to the same criticisms and opposition by the AFL-CIO and many international unions." He said labor will make every effort to have the rule remedied to require states to measure up to the provisions of the act.

To combat the weakening of the federal law, the federation issued its own guidelines on what state job safety provisions should include to meet federal standards.

"Any occupational safety and health bill introduced in your legislature should, as a minimum, contain these basic protections," Meany stressed, adding, "I therefore urge that you make every effort to defeat any proposed legislation which does not."

Among the 23 key points in the AFL-CIO guidelines are:

- A representative of the workers should accompany compliance officers on inspections of the workplace.
- Employers should be required to inform workers who are exposed to toxic materials in excess of set standards.
- Workers or union representatives should be able to file objections to proposed state safety standards and have some form of appeal.
- Workers should be allowed to notify the state administrator of violations in the workplace.
- Employers should be required to post citations of violations at the site where they have occurred.
- Workers or union representatives should be represented equally with management on safety advisory committees.

Meany also called on unions and state and local central bodies to participate in the series of AFL-CIO sponsored job safety institutes being presented at universities across the country.

Citing the importance of the safety training program, Meany said that "strong and effective safety committees must be created where there are none now—and be made more effective where they already exist."

Each union member must be aided in understanding fully his rights and obligations under the act, Meany stressed, "so that he may effectively protect his life and his health on the job."

Labor-Backed Measures:

Congress Clears Bills to Ease Shortage of Doctors, Nurses

only about half of the authorized funds. That wouldn't be enough to carry out the program's objectives, Rogers warned.

Congress remained sharply divided, however, on how to pick up the pieces of the nation's foreign aid program that the Senate shattered by its 41-27 vote killing a much-amended bill.

With only days remaining before most existing spending authority runs out, the House passed an emergency resolution continuing funding for the balance of this session of Congress—while new permanent legislation is drafted.

That was the course urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who warned that an "intolerable" crisis would be created if the United States retreated into rigid isolationism and ran away from its world responsibilities.

But the Senate moved instead to take up two patchwork bills—for the first time separating economic assistance from military aid to America's allies. Both bills were heavily cut by the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee from the budget levels — approximately a one-third slash.

The Senate acted first on the economic aid bill—and in the process dealt a hard blow to the program of long-term, low-interest rates to poor and underdeveloped nations. It voted to more than double the interest charges. However it did ease the blow somewhat by later voting to exempt Alliance for Progress loans to Latin America from the interest hike.

In other congressional developments:

- The House overrode Administration objections to improve the "black lung" benefits program for coal miners, their widows and children.

A non-controversial portion of the bill extended benefit payments to orphans whose fathers died from the disease.

But the House also voted to permit medical evidence other than x-rays to determine whether a disability is caused by pneumoconiosis, to extend federal financing an additional two years, and to bar reduction of other benefits because of black lung compensation.

During the debate, Rep. George G. Minish (D-N.J.), one of the few union members in Congress, told the House what black lung means to a miner and his family.

His father, Minish said, began working in coal mines at the age of nine. "He died at the age of 35," Minish said. During the last four or five years of his life, he never slept in bed, because if he did he would choke from the dust that he had inhaled since he was nine years old."

- Conservation groups sounded an alarm that the White House has launched a major drive to weaken the tough water pollution control bill the Senate passed earlier this month by a vote of 85-0.

The bill, steered to passage by Sen. Edmund Muskie (D-Me.) sets firm deadlines for industries and cities to stop pollution and to use the "best available technology" to do so. It also gives the federal Environmental Protection Agency power to overrule states on pollution matters and to take violators to court if a state refuses to act.

- The Senate voted 76-2 approval of a bill establishing federal standards for warranties covering consumer products.

Over Administration and business opposition, the bill expands the enforcement powers of the Federal Trade Commission. The agency would be given clear authority to set rules spelling out broad categories of unfair practices, instead of having to act on a time-consuming case-by-case procedure. It also allows the FTC to ask federal courts to assess heavy penalties against violators and to seek rebates and payment of damages for consumers.

- The Senate prepared to act on the Administration's tax package—made up of big cuts for corporations and largely token reductions for individuals. The measure has already passed the House.

The Senate Finance Committee made only a few changes—one being to add a new, more generous tax deduction for child care expenses.

The decisive votes, however, will come on amendments to be proposed from the floor.

Conference Urges Laws to Assure Public Employe Bargaining Rights

Harriman, N.Y.—Full collective bargaining rights for public employes should be guaranteed by federal and state laws, participants in the 40th American Assembly declared.

The statement adopted at the close of a four-day conference on collective bargaining in government also upheld the right of public employes to strike after all disputes-settling procedures have been exhausted. Only when a strike actually imperils the public health or safety should it be restrained or limited by court injunction, the participants agreed.

Seventy-five invited guests with expertise in labor realtions and government took part in the program—one of a continuing series sponsored by the American Assembly, an institution established by Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1950 and affiliated with Columbia University.

The group was chosen to represent a diversity of viewpoints—labor and management, city, county and state officials, arbitrators, university professors and journalists.

Its report was presented as a consensus on which there was "general agreement" even though not every participant would subscribe to every recommendation.

"Public unions and collective bargaining are here to stay," the report affirmed. Among its major findings were:

- While presidential Executive Orders have opened the way to collective bargaining in the federal service, workers' rights should be broadened and protected by law and not left to presidential discretion.

- All states should have comprehensive laws ensuring collective bargaining rights and procedures for state, county and local governments. If states fail to enact such laws in a reasonable time, the federal government should act to assure these rights.

- State legislation should permit negotiation of agency shop agreements, but public unions should be barred from using "agency shop fees" for contributions to political candidates or parties in state and local elections.

- If the right to strike is denied because the employes perform an essential service, "provision should be made for impartial, final determination of all issues in dispute."

- Both public employers and unions in the public field have an affirmative obligation to work towards recruitment and upgrading of persons in minority groups to levels that "more adequately reflect the racial balance of residents in the governmental unit."

- The rights and obligations of unions and employers in union organizing campaigns should be basically the same as in the private sector.

- Multi-union and multi-employer bargaining, by mutual consent, should be encouraged in the public sector.

HRDI Staff Explores New Tasks, Challenges

Miami Beach—The AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute swung into its fourth year of operation with a national staff conference exploring the challenges brought on by uncertainty over the nation's economic future.

The six-day conference also reviewed HRDI achievements of the past three years in helping unions to become more deeply involved in manpower programs for the hiring of disadvantaged workers.

HRDI Pres. Julius F. Rothman stressed the impact of the employment situation on the institute's programs.

"We are mindful of the high rate of unemployment in our industrial centers," he said, "which makes our efforts more difficult and, at the same time, more necessary."

HRDI programs in the period between October 1970 and June 1971 helped locate jobs for 11,500 disadvantaged workers, Rothman noted.

The newest HRDI effort is in directing the AFL-CIO Veterans' Assistance Program, which so far has guided almost 600 returning servicemen to jobs and training with the help of the federation's central bodies.

'Feel Better, Now?'

Unemployment Dips, But So Do Earnings

For factory workers, weekly earnings declined 40 cents over the month to $143.24, although both the workweek and overtime increased one-tenth of an hour. The average factory workweek was clocked at 39.7 hours and overtime at 2.9 hours.

The only sectors showing an increase in earnings over September were contract construction and finance, insurance and real estate, the BLS said.

The unemployment rate for blue-collar workers dropped from 8 percent in September to 7.2 percent last month, but it was still above July's 7.1 percent when the overall jobless rate was at 5.8 percent.

White-collar unemployment inched up one-tenth of a point to 3.4 percent.

Joblessness declined in manufacturing industries from 7 percent to 6.3 percent. However, for workers in transportation and public utilities, the rate jumped sharply from 3.6 percent to 4.4 percent. Construction unemployment also rose from 10 percent to 10.3 percent.

The BLS noted that unemployment usually drops between September and October, but that this year's drop was greater than usual. It attributed the decline largely to a reduction in the number of workers who had lost their jobs, mainly adult men whose jobless rate dropped two-tenths of a point to 4.5 percent.

Unemployment rates also dropped for adult women to 5.5 percent, for teenagers to 17 percent, married men to 3 percent, and full-time workers to 5.4 percent. The declines ranged between one-tenth and three-tenths of a point.

But for workers covered by state unemployment insurance programs, the October jobless rate was 4.5 percent—up one-tenth of 1 percent to its highest level in several months.

The number of persons unemployed 15 weeks or longer remained at 1.2 million, seasonally adjusted, but was substantially above the 754,000 in October 1970. The average duration of unemployment climbed to 12.2 weeks from 12 weeks, nearly 4 weeks above the level of a year ago.

The BLS reported a substantial improvement in the job situation for Vietnam era veterans 20 to 29 years old. The jobless rate for this group declined from 8.3 percent to 7 percent last month, the lowest level since October 1970. The jobless rate for non-veterans aged 20-29 was 6.6 percent, the same as September.

Total nonfarm payroll employment was basically unchanged in October at 76.4 million, after an increase of about 400,000 in September. Employment would have risen about 85,000 last month, the BLS said, had it not been for strikes — especially in coal and longshoring.

Jobless Rise In Canada Tied To Government

Ottawa—Pres. Donald MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress said the steep rise in Canadian unemployment to 7.1 percent seasonally adjusted "can only be described as phenomenal and cannot be attributed to recent U.S. economic measures."

MacDonald said the current unemployment problem is the result of past government policies "which continue to plague this country's economy, and not the result of the U.S. import surcharge which has not yet had time to affect significantly the unemployment situation."

"Furthermore," MacDonald said, "present government policies are totally inadequate to cope with our massive unemployment problem. These are the reasons why thousands of Canadian families find themselves today in dire economic straits."

Labor's Pay Board Service Tied to Justice for Workers

Controls Threaten Freedom:

Meany Hits Panel As 'Stacked Deck'

By John M. Barry

Bal Harbour, Fla.—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany accused the Nixon Administration of "stacking the deck" against organized labor in its program to control the nation's economy and called on the trade union movement to "stand united as never before, for never has so much depended upon the strength and unity of the family of labor."

Meany, in his keynote address on the opening day of the federation's ninth convention here, delivered a scathing indictment of the Administration's past economic failures and warned that if Phase 2 of its latest program should fail, labor would be made the "scapegoat."

He charged that Pres. Nixon and his Administration are moving toward authoritarianism, and declared that the very freedoms of the nation and its institutions are at stake.

"We are really at a historic moment in the life of this nation, whether for good or evil, only time will tell," Meany said. "This is the first time in the history of America that any President ever set out to control the economic life of the nation in peacetime."

It is obvious, he said, that if the controls program doesn't work, "and there is no sure indication that it will work, the next step would be more stringent and oppressive measures that could destroy our American institutions.

"If Phase 2 fails, political expediency demands a scapegoat. The man in the White House never says, 'It is my fault.' No politician ever says it is his fault. It demands the scapegoat, and we have no doubt as to who that scapegoat will be.

"Just as we have no explanation as to why the Nixon-Burns economic game plan failed so misera-

Child Care Bill Cleared For Passage

Congress moved a big step closer to enactment of a landmark program of comprehensive child care and development centers for children of working mothers.

A House-Senate conference committee trimmed the final version of the bill to somewhat less than the broad coverage sought by the labor movement, in an effort to avert a presidential veto.

But if the legislation is given final approval by the House and Senate, signed by the President and, especially, adequately financed, it will open an important new phase in social legislation.

The conference bill would make the poorest families eligible for free child care at community centers stressing learning, enrichment and health services—not just "baby-sitting" facilities. Families with incomes up to the Labor Dept.'s low-cost urban budget would pay partial fees on a sliding scale.

In quality of services as well as in expanded eligibility, the legislation goes substantially beyond the Administration's proposal for day

THE NINTH AFL-CIO convention was keynoted by Pres. George Meany in a wide-ranging discussion of the critical problems facing the American trade union movement.

Convention Insists Pacts Be Honored

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—AFL-CIO representatives will remain on the Pay Board only as long as there is a reasonable hope of securing justice for working people, especially those with low or substandard incomes without strong bargaining representatives.

This decision was reached unanimously on the floor of the federation's ninth convention here as the 1,000 delegates acted on a special resolution adopted by the Executive Council an hour earlier.

The council's recommendations —cleared to the floor as a special order of business—called on all AFL-CIO unions to insist at every level on the validity of their contracts and pledged the federation to continue its efforts in Congress to protect the basic concept of the validity of collective bargaining agreements.

The convention pledged that "we will not relax for a moment our fight to increase the standard of life and livelihood for those at the bottom of the economic ladder—those whom the majority of the Pay Board seem to have forgotten."

And it stamped its approval on a reaffirmation of a statement in Pres. George Meany's keynote speech that the "American labor movement will not permit itself to become the scapegoat for Administration policies which have brought this nation to the brink of economic disaster."

After brief discussion, including a comment by Meat Cutters Sec.-

2-Year Record:

Council Report Cites Progress, Setbacks

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has scored victories, suffered defeats, achieved progress and absorbed setbacks in the past two years, the ninth convention was told.

But the report of the federation's Executive Council to the convention stressed that the frustration in achieving some of the last convention's goals is evidence only of sights set high and an unwillingness to settle for second best.

These themes in AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's section of the report highlighted the 400-page document of the 35-member council, a document that reviews developments in the labor movement since the 1969 convention, the national economy, international relations, social security, urban affairs and housing, education, community services, civil rights, labor and the law, national and state legislation and political activities.

The report to the ninth convention contains detailed proposals for action. These recommendations will be referred to convention committees and then to the delegates for discussion and decision.

Meany told the convention that the "nation is in trouble," citing the uncertain state of the economy, high unemployment, a rise in poverty and states and cities on the "brink of bankruptcy."

The AFL-CIO takes "no satisfaction" that the last convention had correctly predicted "that America was on the road to recession, while inflation continued unabated," he said. He reviewed Pres. Nixon's actions from Aug. 15 when "he imposed conditions that were patently unfair and unworkable" and the subsequent developments

Jobless Aid Extension Wins Senate Approval

The Senate voted to extend unemployment benefits to a maximum of 65 weeks in states with the highest levels of joblessness.

It was one of a series of amendments the Senate added to the Administration's tax bill which, as passed by the House last month, carries big tax windfalls for corporations and only token reductions for individuals.

A year ago, when the impact of the Nixon recession was just beginning to be fully felt, Congress voted 13 weeks of extended benefits to workers in states with high joblessness.

But, as senators from high unemployment states pointed out in the debate, this only delayed the time until hundreds of thousands of unemployed workers were forced on welfare rolls.

The new amendment, sponsored by Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) and liberalized by changes suggested by other senators, would permit up to 26 weeks additional

Civil Rights Agency Faults Nixon Record

By Mike Bosch

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights charged the Nixon Administration with failing to adequately enforce civil rights laws and regulations.

It said the Administration, from the President on down, has failed "to develop and to communicate to the public a sense of urgency over the need to end discrimination."

The six-member commission, headed by Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, Notre Dame University president, had assessed the Administration's civil rights efforts a year ago and found them suffering from inertia and hostility.

Its new report found some signs of improvement. But the commission said that on a four-point scale of poor, marginal, adequate and good, no government agency had yet scored better than a "marginal" grade.

The commission members did not place the entire blame on Pres. Nixon. But they did stress that the President "represents the ultimate source of policy direction to which the federal establishment looks for guidance . . . and is responsible for the success or failure of the Administration's civil rights program."

Evaluating the White House

A TRIBUTE to the late Herman Kenin, founding president of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes (SPACE), is delivered at the council's convention by Stanley Ballard, secretary-treasurer of the Musicians.

Kirkland Sees Layoffs Spur to Organization

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Collective bargaining is the only instrument "to give the scientist, artist or professional man a voice in dealing with an establishment that's really against him," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes (SPACE).

Addressing a luncheon meeting of the 90 delegates to the group's third biennial convention here, Kirkland said SPACE was founded "not as a symbol of snobbery, nor the kind of elitism that plays too great a role in American society" but as "an instrument of progress adaptable to issues never anticipated by the founders of the trade union movement."

Delegates to the convention represent 17 affiliated internationals with hundreds of thousands of members in the performing arts, the sciences and professional jobs. During their one-day convention, they approved an increase in per capita tax, elected officers and passed a number of resolutions dealing with the working conditions of professionals and the nation's cultural activities.

Kirkland noted that the current recession, accompanied by a tight job market—even for professionals—should convince these employes that they need the labor movement.

The layoff of nearly 100,000 men, many of them highly qualified engineers from Boeing's Seattle complex, "has proven that the Ph.D.—when the pressure is on, when the profits decline—is regarded just as expendable as the sweeper in the plant," Kirkland said.

"They look just the same in the lines at the unemployment office," he said.

To those who would charge that the labor movement is out of step or passing from the scene, Kirkland pointed back to the AFL in 1896 when Samuel Gompers' ledger books recorded per capita payments from now defunct unions such as the Horse Collar Makers and Walking Stick & Umbrella union.

"If you looked at it then, you would have said that it didn't have a chance because the organizations that comprised it were on their way out."

Yet, many of the unions that make up SPACE are just on their way in, because American labor has "totally democratized the theory of leisure," and given the American working man a new freedom—a gift of time.

It will be unions like those in SPACE, he said, that will give these freed workers a "greatly expanded cultural identity."

Delegates unanimously approved a per capita increase from 1 cent to 1.5 cents to help pay for expanded public relations and publication efforts and legislative work.

Delegates supported resolutions seeking to include professionals under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and one on pending legislation that would protect the rights of employe inventors and assure recording artists just compensation when their recorded works are exploited.

Another resolution directed the officers and executive board of SPACE to formulate a program "specifically designed to assist union members and their families and union organizations that wish to take greater advantage of the nation's cultural resources."

Elected to head SPACE for the next two years was Teachers' Pres. David Selden. Pres. William T. Cleary of the Technical Engineers was elected vice president, and Angus Duncan, executive secretary of Actors' Equity, was elected treasurer.

Outgoing officers were Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County Municipal Employes, Past Pres. Charles Cogen of the Teachers and Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Federal Service Drive Stressed:

New Programs Voted, Financed At Metal Trades Convention

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Pres. Paul J. Burnsky of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. put major emphasis of the department's 55th convention on increased organizing and servicing efforts—especially in the federal service

The more than 100 delegates to the biennial session voted an increase in per capita tax, from 3 to 5 cents, to help meet the cost of the program. They represented 22 affiliated unions and 25 local metal trades councils with a total membership of 3.5 million.

"We cannot carry out the responsible work we have to do in the many areas in which we operate without having more income, more staff," Burnsky said in his keynote address to the convention. "There is only one place we can look to for our future and that is to the international unions who jointly gave birth to this department which works under your direction for your best interest."

Delegates elected Burnsky and Sec.-Treas. Clayton W. Bilderback to their first full four-year terms, and returned nine department vice presidents to office, including the newest, Pres. Harold J. Buoy of the Boilermakers.

Burnsky was named president of the department only three months before the convention upon the retirement of Maywood Boggs.

The convention also heard a message from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany who was unable to attend due to Pay Board duties in Washington.

Meany said in a telegram that "labor remains unshakably convinced that no economic program can succeed unless it is grounded on the fundamental principle of equality. That remains our goal and we will continue to fight to achieve it."

Nearly 60 resolutions were acted on by delegates, many of them on federal employment, including one on organizing submitted by the Federal Metal Trades Council at Charleston, S.C.

Since no one international union can provide a full-time representative at each shipyard, the council suggested that "a trained crew of international representatives be assigned to work each yard as a team on a regular visitation schedule. . . ."

The approved resolution also called for a two-day Washington seminar for all Federal Employes Metal Trades Council presidents and international representatives servicing federal employes.

The purpose of such a meeting, the resolution said, would be adopting an on-going program of organizing, servicing and training.

Other resolutions adopted:

- Put the department on record as favoring a labor relations law for federal employes—similar to the National Labor Relations Act.
- Voiced support for pending legislation that would give federal employes a 10-percent differential for night work even if they are ungraded employes.
- Emphasized the need for attaining one nationwide contract with the U.S. Navy, instead of hundreds of smaller ones, negotiated in an atmosphere where managers of agencies can "use government money for endless haggling."

In this vein, Burnsky urged local councils and affiliated unions to attain exclusive recognition from the Navy. Earlier in his keynote, he recounted two raiding attempts by "purported labor organizations" for federal employes, both unaffiliated, at the Norfolk Naval Shipyard and at the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard, in Kittery, Me.

In a report on collective bargaining in the federal service, Burnsky singled out the Navy as an example of deteriorating relations between the Metal Trades and the government.

"During the past several years, there is no question but that the relationship between our department and the Navy has lost much of its previous benefit and meaning," Burnsky said, adding that there will be additional problems under the President's new Executive Order 11616.

"There is a neat demarcation line in the new Executive Order between what may be negotiated and what the employer is obliged to negotiate on," he said. There is no question in our mind but that instructions and guidance from the Navy's Office of Civilian & Management in Washington has resulted in local Navy management deciding that it would not negotiate on various matters on which it could negotiate but was not obligated to negotiate."

Convention speakers included Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers, Pres. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO's Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Sec.-Treas. Edward P. Murphy of the federation's Union Labor & Service Dept.

Right of Unions Cited To Settle Own Disputes

The AFL-CIO has joined the fight against a Labor Board decision that would undercut the right of unions to settle jurisdictional disputes against themselves.

In a "friend of the court" brief submitted to the U.S. Supreme Court, the federation said that such disputes must "be resolved within labor's own ranks, where they properly should be settled."

The high court is considering the important test case on appeal of the National Labor Relations Board. It involves a 1967 jurisdictional dispute between Plasterers Local 79 and another union performing work for the Texas State Tile & Terrazzo Co. at Houston.

The Plasterers local and the other union were willing to abide by an award—to the Plasterers—by the National Joint Board for Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes in accordance with the constitution of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.

But the employer was not satisfied with the award and took the case to the NLRB which ruled in favor of Texas State Tile's designation of jurisdiction, stating that employers are permitted to force a compulsory arbitration hearing.

The federation brief, however, said the section of the act invoked by the NLRB only provides for such action when the unions involved do not voluntarily settle a jurisdictional dispute and that the NLRB should have refrained from any action in the Texas State Tile dispute.

Thomas E. Harris, associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO, who submitted the brief, noted that the NLRB's intervention in such a case destroys "inter-union (jurisdictional) settlement which Congress was careful to preserve" in the National Labor Relations Act.

The Plasterers took the case to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, which overturned the NLRB decision. The Labor Board then took the case to the Supreme Court.

The issue for the high court to decide is whether a jurisdictional agreement between two unions can be set aside simply because the employer "has not consented to be bound" by the inter-union procedure.

New Policies Asked On Transportation

By Rex Hardesty

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Support for a national transportation system that coordinates rail, trucking and seagoing usage was urged by delegates to the biennial convention of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

In authorizing a two-year study on national passenger and freight transportation, the convention noted that current policy hasn't been updated for 30 years and stressed that the seagoing segment couldn't be revitalized without assistance from labor, management and government.

Seafarers Pres. Paul Hall was elected to his eighth two-year term as president of the MTD. Vice Pres. Jack McDonald and Executive Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin also were re-elected unanimously by the 300 delegates, who represented 44 affiliated unions with about 8 million members.

National transportation policy was also the topic of a speech by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), whose new trade bill would assist shipping on U.S. flag ships. The bill, cosponsored by Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.), received strong convention backing.

The Burke-Hartke bill was termed a must for the American shipping industry, which now carries only 5 percent of U.S. imports and exports and was described as "a barely breathing corpse" by Helen Delich Bentley, chairman of the Federal Maritime Commission.

Mrs. Bentley and Robert J. Blackwell, deputy assistant Secretary of Commerce for maritime affairs, pledged federal aid in revitalizing the U.S. merchant marine and praised the MTD for unifying both labor and management behind the effort.

A convention resolution, however, criticized the freight shippers and forwarders association and three federal agencies—Agriculture, Defense and Agency for International Development—for undermining maritime unity by "ignoring available American-flag vessels and placing American imports and exports in the holds of foreign-flag carriers at the expense of their own nation's fleet."

In advocating a national transportation policy, the MTD said the nation was "faced with paralysis of a $200 billion industry upon which the entire U.S. economy is based."

Among the nations of the world, the convention said, "only the United States lacks a complete and integrated national transportation policy. This nation is approaching a point where it will soon be too late to act to prevent a transportation breakdown."

The Interstate Commerce Act, designed to meet the needs of the 1940s, is still the nation's only program, except for "broad policy statements that serve only to indicate again that the situation is desperate." Haphazard development of multi-lane highways, airports and railroads has aggravated problems for the environment, public safety and urban housing, the convention said.

The MTD committee on foreign trade noted that 25 years ago, when the merchant marine began to decline, they were assured that America was a manufacturing nation which did not need seagoing vessels. Today, the committee noted, manufacturing in shoes, textiles, electronics and many other products has declined, with theorists now saying that America is a service nation.

United Textile Workers Pres. George Baldanzi, co-chairman of the foreign trade committee with Leather Goods Pres. Charles Feinstein, told the delegates that the exporting of U.S. jobs—estimated at 700,000 by convention reports—has done virtually no good for foreign workers, who have salaries ranging down to 7 cents an hour for women in South Korea. "In America, we can fight, strike and boycott," Baldanzi said, "but these workers put their lives on the line in trade union activity."

Under present practices of the multinational companies, he noted, import taxes of 50 percent would still leave a large margin of profit on a pair of shoes manufactured for a few dollars in Italy and sold in the United States for $40.

To correct the job loss from foreign products flooding the U.S. market, the convention recommended:

- Revision of taxes on imports.
- Restriction of capital investment abroad by U.S.-based multinational companies.
- Streamlining of programs governing import abuses such as dumping.
- Elimination of foreign-made components in products billed as U.S.-made.
- Creation of a new Foreign Trade & Investment Commission to handle trade issues.
- Introduction of a flexible quota system.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the convention that U.S. foreign policy is "a real puzzle" in which any nation which has suppressed freedom is now embraced. Meany said it is based on the idea that "we have got to be nice, kindly, decent and cooperative" with everybody.

The same attitude extends to foreign trade, "that we have to be cooperative with the low-wage nations of the earth. That is fine, but not at the expense of American jobs," Meany said, because less than 6 percent of American products have ever been for foreign consumption and to drive down the American buying power through low wages would ruin the market for the other 94 percent of U.S. products.

Meany said the effort to drive down U.S. wages "as the only way to compete in foreign trade" is a charade pushed actively by big business. That same attitude is reflected, Meany said, in present Nixon Administration economic policies which ignore "the most pressing problem facing the American people—unemployment."

MARITIME TRADES DEPT. Pres. Paul Hall keynotes the department's convention which focused attention on the critical challenge facing the American merchant marine as well as problems of trade and the national economy.

Jobless Aid Hike Voted in California

Sacramento, Calif.—A bill raising unemployment benefits from $65 to $75 a week was unanimously approved by both houses of the state legislature.

The bill, which was strongly pushed by the state labor federation, has been sent to the governor for his signature.

The executive secretary-treasurer of the state AFL-CIO, John F. Henning, pointed out that the maximum weekly jobless benefit had not been increased since 1965 and the cost of living has increased by more than 20 percent over that period.

Privacy Lost To 'Snooping' Employers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Employers have come up with new methods of "snooping" on workers, delegates to the Maritime Trades Dept. convention were told.

The report to the convention on invasion of privacy was the third in the series ordered at the 1969 MTD convention and dealt with the "worker's world, privacy and the need to know." It traced modern corporate snooping as a direct descendant of serfdom and the company town, based on the company's "obligation" to decide what was good for its employes.

Snooping to detect union organizing activities has all but disappeared from the modern scene, the report said, but "today they are interested in the total employe and his total behavior; his thoughts, his tastes, his habits and his hobbies.

"To satisfy that interest they are armed with electronic gadgets of all kinds—closed-circuit TV, radar and ultra-sensitive microphones for surveillance; complex 'pyschological' tests for applicants, both new hires and candidates for promotion, and of course, polygraph. The old-fashioned method of direct search and oversight are still widely used as well."

While acknowledging an employer's legitimate right to know some facts about the employe "relevant to the job he fills and necessary to an accurate assessment of his job performance, present and potential," the report said a "balance must be struck between employer needs and employe privacy."

Council Doubles Goal Of COPE Dollar Drive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its preconvention meeting approved a recommendation from the COPE Operating Committee to seek $2 voluntary contributions from union members in 1972 rather than the $1 requested in recent years. Under the council's action, the voluntary quota for international unions will be increased commensurately.

The proposal had been adopted unanimously by the COPE operating committee, which noted that the requested $1 contribution from union members and the voluntary quota on international unions of 12.5 cents per member were both established in 1955.

It cited these factors in presenting the proposal:

- The dollar drive and union voluntary quotas "no longer reflect political realities" in the light of the "explosion" in campaign spending. Overall campaign costs have nearly tripled since 1956, the report noted, and spending for television and radio alone has quadrupled.
- As a result of this spending explosion, requests for labor assistance from candidates have ballooned, and COPE has faced a losing battle in attempting to stretch every dollar for maximum effectiveness.
- Ominous "rumbles" have been created by proposals of conservative forces in Congress that would hamstring labor's political activity.

The Executive Council also received a letter from the International Alliance of Bill Posters, Billers & Distributors that it was returning its charter and requesting affiliation for its remaining locals on the basis of directly affiliated local unions. The union was chartered in 1903 by the American Federation of Labor. Its convention in September 1971 voted the surrender of the charter effective Oct. 31, 1971.

The council approved contributions to the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and the Washington, D.C., United Givers Fund.

One-House Legislature Backed in North Dakota

Jamestown, N.D.—The North Dakota AFL-CIO is supporting the creation of a one-chamber state legislature in hopes of achieving a more responsive and efficient legislative process. The issue is currently before a state constitutional convention.

Overwhelming support for the legislative reform came from the 160 delegates to the 14th annual state federation convention, which will reconvene early next year to review the actions of the constitutional convention.

Delegates contended that too much "buck-passing" exists under the current two-house legislature. A unicameral legislature would eliminate much of the competition between the houses, they stressed.

In other resolutions, the convention called for passage of the National Health Security program and for improvements in the state minimum wage law to bring it more in line with federal standards. State minimum wages currently range between $1.15 and $1.45 an hour.

Pres. Wallace J. Dockter was re-elected to his fifth consecutive two-year term over Wallace E. Rasmussen, president of the Fargo-Moorehead AFL-CIO.

Re-elected without opposition were Sec.-Treas. Robert A. Donegan and First Vice Pres. Jayson Graba. Three new members of the executive board were also elected.

ILPA Convention:

Labor Press Held Key Link In Achieving Goals of Unions

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The labor press is indispensable to virtually every trade union activity and its editors should keep in mind that members are a divergent group with far-flung interests, delegates to the International Labor Press Association's biennial convention were told.

Labor publications are an invaluable link for union goals in organizing, bargaining, legislation and political action, a panel on communications agreed. But its members stressed that since the readers vary widely in age, sex, race and residence, they must also be appealed to on other than standard trade union issues.

The convention's 143 delegates from some 400 union publications elected Raymond W. Pasnick of the Steelworkers as the new ILPA president, raised its dues and broadened associate membership requirements.

The discussion of the role of the labor press in union communication was led by AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis, Community Services Director Leo Perlis and Assistant Organizing Director Alan Kistler. The labor press will have the added job of keeping the facts straight during Phase 2 of the Administration's new economic program, the delegates were told later by Andrew J. Biemiller, AFL-CIO legislative director.

Too often, unions reach their members only on such topics as negotiating and grievances, or on the "bread and butter level," Perlis said. To be fully effective, unions must reach workers on the added levels of "special interest" which consider the worker as a citizen, consumer and family head, he noted.

Davis reminded the editors that their publications were in direct competition with outside media and should try to dispel inaccuracies about labor in schools and textbooks.

Union publications have a potential readership of 3.2 million among the Spanish-speaking, Kistler told the delegates. He said Spanish language publications would be needed increasingly to reach the unorganized.

Biemiller warned that the White House is overwhelming the other branches of government because Congress is in a "constant mess" from lack of party discipline and the judiciary is threatened with being "merged into the executive" through Nixon's court appointments.

The lack of vigorous leadership in Congress could result in further delays on equal employment, minimum wage and campaign spending legislation, Biemiller said. The last chance to stop the $75 billion giveaway to big business in Nixon's tax bill could be similarly lost, he warned.

The legislative fight will continue to preserve the principle that "a contract is a contract" in the face of Nixon Administration economic policies, he said. Even conservative members of Congress will concede that manufacturers must fulfill long-term supply contracts or that investment firms can't call back bonds floated at 10 percent interest just because the rate has gone down, Biemiller said, but applying the same rules to workers' pay isn't so easy.

Richard L. Harwood, an assistant managing editor and "internal critic" of the Washington Post, said in the ILPA's A. J. Liebling memorial address that today, "news is what we say it is" and that newspapermen "can't judge the fairness of our method because we have no method—impressionism is the order of the day."

Harwood warned that labor papers can fall into the same pitfalls of resisting change because of the inordinate sensitivity of editors to criticism, a bureaucracy that develops "its own private perspective" and a political dimension to news coverage that makes reporters' "detached objectivity" a myth.

The convention heard a report from a committee studying proposed increases in mail rates affecting labor publications. The committee warned that non-profit, second-class rates could be increased as much as 750 percent under the proposed new rates. The Postal Rate Commission recently completed hearings on the Postal Service rate proposals, but has not yet issued its findings.

The ILPA's testimony at the hearings was presented to the convention, which urged that the committee's report be printed and distributed to union officers. The action reflected the widespread concern of the ILPA delegates, many of whose publications could not survive a 750 percent increase in postage costs.

As ILPA president, Pasnick succeeds Ken Fiester, who served eight years as secretary-treasurer before being elected president in 1969. Pasnick, editor of Steel Labor since 1963, served three terms as an ILPA vice president.

John M. Barry, managing editor of the AFL-CIO News, was re-elected secretary-treasurer and 11 vice presidents were returned to new two-year terms.

They are Burt Beck, the Clothing Workers' Advance; Ted Bleecker, United Teacher, New York City; Charles Borsari, Ohio AFL-CIO Focus; E. T. (Buck) Harris, Screen Actor; Al Herling, B&C News, Bakery & Confectionery Workers; Gene Klare, Oregon Labor Press; William V. Scoggins, the Record, East Chicago, Ind.; George Ryder, the Government Standard, Government Employes; George Scriven, United Rubber Worker; Aldo Vagnozzi, Michigan AFL-CIO News, and J. R. Watkins, the Labor World, Chattanooga, Tenn.

Four new vice presidents elected were Morden Lazarus, Labor Review, Ontario; Sal Perrotta, Los Angeles Citizen; Stan Williams, Pennsylvania AFL-CIO News, and R. J. Williamson, Maintenance of Way Employes Railway Journal. All elections were unanimous.

Dues for member publications were increased to $1.25 per thousand circulation, with minimums of $125 a year for international publications and $30 a year for local and central bodies. Associate members' dues were raised to $25 a year and honorary memberships were established, with former president Fred Sweet of St. Paul, Minn., awarded the first such card.

The four-day convention also heard a presentation of labor history by Leon Stein, editor of Justice, and two university officials, Albert Blum of Michigan State and Roberta McBride of Wayne State. Workshops were also conducted on "readable writing" by Roy H. Copperud of Southern California and on typography by Edward P. Arnold of Syracuse University.

Changing Role Forecast For Union Health Funds

Negotiated health and welfare funds will not be wiped out by enactment of the National Health Security program AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman assured the administrators and trustees of these funds.

Speaking at a series of regional seminars conducted by the National Foundation of Health, Welfare & Pension Plans, Seidman said that Health Security would cause the plan operators to make substantial changes, "but they would not have to go out of business."

Although Health Security would provide a wider range of services than almost all existing plans or alternative proposals, Seidman pointed out that it would not cover all health services.

He said the health and welfare plans could provide the supplementary benefits not covered by Health Security, such as adult dental care, skilled nursing home care after 120 days, and outpatient and inpatient psychiatric care.

Most of these services currently are not handled by health and welfare plans, he said, "but relieved of the burden of financing basic health care services, they could turn to these important areas."

Seidman said the health and welfare trust funds could also extend their services to such areas as cash sickness benefits, supplementary unemployment benefits, increased pensions, group auto insurance and child care.

He further pointed that once the health and welfare plans are freed of escalating health insurance costs, they could develop many new programs of great value to union members.

Under the insurance industry proposal for national health care, the trusts would continue to operate without making changes, Seidman said.

"The trouble is that 'business as usual' means retaining all the defects of our present medical care system—high costs, low quality, inefficiency and all the rest," he asserted.

Seidman said the AFL-CIO will continue to fight for enactment of Health Security and urged the health and welfare fund administrators to contribute their support.

Health Security offers the challenge to the trust funds to provide more and better services to their members and, at the same time, the opportunity to bring better health care to all Americans, he stressed.

Pact Ends Long Dispute With Litton Shipyards

Pascagoula, Miss.—A new three-year contract calling for pay increases from 70 to 88 cents an hour has been agreed to by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Council here and approved overwhelmingly by some 9,000 employes in the Litton Shipyards.

The new contract, ratified by a 2-1 vote in the "old" shipyards and by 3-1 in the new, highly-automated west bank, closed well over a year of negotiations. Company insistence that the two be regarded as separate yards with different work rules contributed to the delay in reaching agreement, but the new contract allows transferral of seniority between the two yards.

Most journeymen will reach salary levels of $4.10 per hour in the last step of the three-year contract, with laborers reaching $3.20 and some crafts $4.40. Most crafts were paid $3.62 an hour under the old contract.

The previous five-year contract would have run until late in 1972 and the company's agreement 18 months ago to re-open it was a major step in union efforts to improve conditions in the Litton yards. A model non-discrimination clause and a training effort under union auspices were previous steps in the accord.

But the negotiations were marked by a wildcat strike and a lockout of both yards as recently as September.

Dean Girardot, Machinists representative and chairman of the Metal Trades bargaining committee, termed the new contract "an excellent agreement."

Publications Honored For Value to Members

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The nation's labor press "provides an impressive panoramic view of organized labor in action and is an influence for the common good."

These were the views of the panel of judges for the 1971 awards contest for the International Labor Press Association after examining more than 500 entries in 14 categories.

The three judges were Charles Crissey, retired editor of the Guild Reporter; Henry Lowenstern, executive editor of the Monthly Labor Review of the U.S. Dept. of Labor, and Jack Rosenthal of the New York Times.

The judges said that "to literally thousands of union members—and their families—the union paper may be the only tangible contact with the organization. Union meetings, barring a strike or contract settlement vote, are attended only by a faithful few. Given a dues check-off, some seldom see a shop steward.

"This is the contact gap which the union papers tries to fill and it is successful in the degree to which it avoids the drab and dull and presents the bright and attractive. In the mercantile world, it is known as the art of packaging and art it is, in fact."

The 1971 winners are:

International Publications: Circulation of 150,000 or more, newspaper format, Allied Industrial Worker; magazine format, Changing Education (Teachers); under 100,000 circulation, newspaper format, Seafarers Log; magazine format, AFTRA.

State and Local Central Bodies' Publications: 15,000 or more circulation, Ohio AFL-CIO Focus; less than 15,000 circulation, California AFL-CIO News.

Local Union Publications: 15,000 or more circulation, 1199 News (Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Local 1199, New York City); 5,000 to 15,000 circulation, FLM Joint Board Tempo (Fur & Leather Workers, New York City); less than 5,000 circulation, Electranews (IBEW Local 1969, Redwood City, Calif.)

Special Performance Awards: Best cartoon—Canadian Pulp & Paper Workers Journal; best photograph—Justice (Ladies Garment Workers); editorial—Union Advocate (St. Paul); best feature—Changing Education; unique performance—Oil Chemical & Atomic Union News.

Yule Shows Slated By Galesburg Unions

Galesburg, Ill.—The Galesburg Trades & Labor Assembly will sponsor seven shows at two local theaters as a free Christmas present to area youngsters from Galesburg unions.

Tickets to the Dec. 23 and 24 shows will be distributed by union members and at local union headquarters.

At Union Label Convention:

Effective Boycott Machinery Shaped

By Tom Castor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Sec.-Treas. Edward P. Murphy of the AFL-CIO's Union Label & Service Trades Dept. pledged to the 55th biennial convention of the department to set up expanded, efficient and selective boycott machinery.

The 270 delegates elected Murphy, who serves as director of the department, Pres. Richard F. Walsh and seven vice presidents by acclamation. The newest vice president is Pres. Ed S. Miller of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes who succeeded John O'Hara, a past president of the Tobacco Workers.

Fresh from the department's success in a boycott of La-Z-Boy chairs, the delegates passed a resolution calling on all of the 91 affiliated unions to maintain close communication with the Union Label Dept. in order to achieve maximum success in any boycott campaign."

The resolution also directed the department to set up guidelines for boycott campaigns.

"The most challenging and difficult task the department faces in the next two years is setting up the most efficient and successful boycott machinery in existence," Murphy told the convention.

"We will be selective in our boycotts so as not to render this weapon ineffective through overuse. The boycott is the muscle of our department and we intend to flex it . . ."

Furniture Workers Pres. Fred Fulford presented Murphy with a scroll in appreciation of Union Label's efforts in the La-Z-Boy strike.

Another major theme of the convention was labor's concern at the rising tide of imports from low-wage countries.

"A half million jobs lost due to trade policies is no small matter to organizations dedicated to preserving job security of working men and women," Murphy stressed.

He said the import question renews another project "cast aside in good times—union label agreements."

The whole idea of such an agreement, Murphy said, is to attach to a product the union seal of approval, "the consumer's guide to a quality product."

"If the 14 million AFL-CIO members and their families wholly subscribed to the union label philosophy, it could cause enough waves to slow down ships bringing in goods produced at low wages in foreign countries."

Delegates approved a resolution along these lines urging the AFL-CIO to encourage all affiliates to enter into union label contracts and calling on unions "to be more forceful in their insistence that the service establishment prominently display the shop card."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in an address to the convention criticized the international relations policy of the Nixon Administration as a "further threat to American jobs."

"We have been exporting American jobs for some years in this country. Foreign competition as we knew it over the years does not exist any longer," Meany told the delegates.

"We are not competing with foreign private enterprise in these foreign countries; we are competing with franchises that are owned and operated by big business here in America."

Meany said the current U.S. foreign policy should disturb members of the department, "because the Label Trades department is founded on a philosophy of purchasing union-made goods and using union-made services, on the theory that if you bought union-made goods you'd have some assurance that the people who made them got a decent wage and worked under decent conditions."

Other speakers dealt with the problem of cheaply made imports.

Pres. John E. Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers told delegates that 275 million pairs of foreign-made shoes were shipped to the United States in the first nine months of 1971 and that those shoes represented a loss of 100,000 American jobs.

American shoe workers will produce 5 million pairs of shoes this year, Mara reported, as compared to 580 million in 1959.

Steelworkers Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke noted that, since World War II, American business has set up 8,000 foreign subsidiaries, "mostly to take advantage of cheap, exploited labor."

"If we could convince the public that it would be to their benefit to shop union, we would no longer have to stand idly by while watching the jobs of our members going down the drain," Burke said.

The convention resolved that the Union Label Dept. renew its efforts in that direction, using whatever media or means possible from bumper stickers to billboards and from book covers to television broadcasts.

Other resolutions:

- Put the convention on record as favoring a broadened labor-management relationship promoting union-made products to the consumer.
- Called on affiliates to seek legislation providing severe penalties for use of phony union labels.
- Called on the House Ways & Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee to schedule early hearings on the labor-endorsed Foreign Trade & Investment Act of 1972 sponsored by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) and Rep. James Burke (D-Mass.) and to report the bill out favorably.
- Renewed support for the Smithsonian Institution's Festival of American Folk Life in which trade unions are major exhibitors.
- Supported a boycott of the Pottery Workers against Metlox Manufacturing Co.
- Listed Holly Farms Poultry Industries as unfair to organized labor because the company has repeatedly refused to comply with National Labor Relations Board certification of the Meat Cutters as bargaining agent for 800 employes at its Glen Allen, Va., plant.
- Urged all international unions to participate in the 1972 Union Industries show at San Diego.

Delegates also passed resolutions in memory of the late Joseph E. Lewis, former secretary-treasurer of the department; Anthony J. DeAndrade, an executive board member, and John M. Baer, who was for many years editorial cartoonist for the department's publications.

Minorities Represent 12% of Apprentices

Nearly 12 percent of all new apprentices registered in 1970 were minority group members, compared with 10 percent in 1969, the Labor Dept. reported.

The number of registered apprentices in all trades was at a record 280,000 last year.

A DRAMATIC DISPLAY on the union label and the threat to American jobs formed the backdrop for the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.'s convention opening. Department Pres. Richard F. Walsh keynoted the two-day meeting with a discussion of foreign trade and investment problems.

Noise on the Job Called Danger To Health, Hearing of Millions

After centuries of being regarded largely as an annoyance, noise has finally burst upon the ecology scene. It has emerged, along with air and water contamination, as our third pollutant.

Why it has taken so long to move with knowledge and precision in the area of noise pollution is puzzling indeed, says Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc., the labor press news service.

Conn, writing in a recent issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO monthly magazine, takes the American public to task for ignoring the warnings of accoustical authorities for many years.

"As long ago as 1830," the article says, "doctors in England confirmed that noise was the cause of deafness in blacksmiths."

Perhaps, Conn suggests, it has taken the technology of modern times to make the public aware of the noise problem and regard it as more than a nuisance.

America's workers are the main victims of noise pollution, he points out. Several years ago, the Federal Council for Science & Technology estimated that workers in the United States experiencing noise conditions unsafe to hearing numbered "in excess of 6 million and as high as 16 million."

Noise standards within industry are the subject of a controversy which dates back to 1964. In that year the Labor Dept. held public hearings on a proposed set of revisions to the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act. A single noise limit of 85 decibels was recommended.

The proposal won the support of organized labor and many health and noise authorities, but opposition from many sections of industry delayed action five years.

When the Nixon Administration took office in 1969, the standards were softened, Conn notes, "to the satisfaction of the most conservative management groups."

The relaxed standards permit a level of 90 decibels for eight hours, 105 decibels for as long as one hour and 115 for 15 minutes.

Since the adoption of the Occupational Safety & Health Act in 1970, these standards have been accepted by the government as the permissible noise exposure level under the new act, as well as other regulations.

Moves are now being made in Congress to revise on-job noise exposure standards.

Rep. William F. Ryan (D-N.Y.), on introducing the proposed Occupational Noise Act of 1971, charged that the Administration's existing standards "are demonstrably too lax to protect the majority of working men and women. Scientific research has clearly shown that prolonged exposure to noise levels of 85 decibels or more will result in permanent hearing impairment for the average individual."

It may also lead to other health problems, Conn points out. He quotes Dr. Alexander Cohen of the U.S. Public Health Service as citing "complaints of extreme fatigue, irritability, insomnia and impaired tactile functions among those workers repeatedly exposed to high level industrial noise."

Conn's article cites the construction industry as one of the most noise saturated, posing dangers for both workers and those nearby. Yet, he notes, contractors continue to challenge the danger of construction noises on the ground that operators are away from their machines for a sufficient period of time.

The noise problem as it affects the American worker, the article observes, has two aspects—the need to abate occupational noise and the need to compensate the worker who suffers a health impairment because of it.

The article quotes one acoustical expert as suggesting that the ideal way to cut down on noise is to stop it at its source by keeping production equipment properly adjusted, isolated and dynamically balanced.

As for workmen's compensation benefits, Conn points out that more than a dozen states do not consider noise-induced hearing loss compensable. And in those that do, benefits for loss of hearing in both ears range from $33,000 in Arizona to $4,500 in Nebraska, with most states closer to the lower level.

A major problem is that most states require workers to stay away from their jobs for a certain period of time to determine how much of the hearing loss is permanent and how much is temporary. Few workers can afford to do so.

In closing, Conn points out that even the Nixon Administration is beginning to realize the dangers of excessive noise and has submitted a bill along the same lines as the Ryan proposal.

Senior Citizens Assail 'Run-Around' by Nixon

The nation's elderly are getting the run-around from the Nixon Administration, a spokesman for the 3-million-member National Council of Senior Citizens, charged at a congressional hearing.

Pres. Nixon proclaims his concern for their welfare, meets with them at the White House but does little to alleviate their poverty and suffering, William R. Hutton, executive director of the NCSC, told lawmakers at a hearing on the need to provide comprehensive services for older Americans.

Hutton called on the Nixon Administration "to match its rhetoric directed to the elderly with action."

Five million men and women age 65 or over are impoverished and millions of others in this age bracket are very close to the poverty line "and getting closer day by day," Hutton told members of a House Education subcommittee headed by Rep. John Brademas (D-Ind.).

"When we ask the President to do something for these unfortunates, all we get is silence."

Hutton said NCSC Pres. Nelson H. Cruikshank wrote Nixon five days after the economic freeze asking him to support "a desperately needed social security increase and a federal takeover of aid to more than 3.5 million indigent aged, blind and disabled."

A non-committal acknowledgment came from the White House and "we have yet to receive a substantive answer from the President," Hutton reported.

The appeal to the President was prompted, he said, by "the deep concern of the low income elderly over the statement in announcement of the freeze that he will recommend that Congress delay welfare reform for a year.

Hutton called the Administration long on statements of compassion and concern for the elderly and "woefully short on performance."

"The actual record of the Administration is one of incredible footdragging in the area of programs to make life better for the elderly," Hutton charged, citing a list of instances which, he said, "demonstrate the low priority the elderly have in this Administration."

A COMPREHENSIVE STUDY into causes of cancer in workers exposed to chemicals and other elements is being launched by the American Cancer Society in cooperation with nearly two dozen AFL-CIO affiliated and unaffiliated unions. The program was announced at the Cancer Society's annual meeting in New York City. From left are George H. R. Taylor, AFL-CIO safety specialist, Pres. Albert Hutchinson of the Asbestos Workers, Dr. E. Cuyler Hammond of the Cancer Society, Dr. Irving J. Selikoff of the Mount Sinai School of Medicine, Pres. Alexander J. Rohan of the Printing Pressmen and Pres. Bertram A. Powers of Typographical Union Local 6. The project is being financed by the Cancer Society.

Federal Action Sought On Asbestos Hazards

The AFL-CIO has called on the Labor Dept. to take emergency action to head off a massive epidemic of cancer among workers exposed to asbestos dust.

In a letter to Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, George H. R. Taylor, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, submitted a study showing that growing use of asbestos in industry has brought "appallingly high" rates of cancer among the five million workers involved.

The study was prepared by Dr. Irving J. Selikoff and the staff of the Mount Sinai Medical School, the AFL-CIO and the Ad Hoc Committee on the Asbestos Hazard of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

It showed that workers exposed to asbestos dust suffer three times the incidence of all kinds of cancer as workers in general and six times the normal rate of lung cancer.

"Only drastic and immediate action will contain and slow the developing incidence and prevalance of death from these diseases," Taylor warned Hodgson.

He urged the Secretary to issue an emergency bulletin warning of the danger and requiring employers to take stringent measures to reduce the concentration of asbestos dust in all work places. Hodgson was to meet with labor representatives within 30 days.

Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther, who oversees the operations of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, agreed to meet with the labor safety group.

Guenther also noted that OSHA's Office of Safety & Health Standards was preparing a proposal that sets a ceiling on the exposure levels to asbestos dust.

Chairmen Listed For 9th Convention

On Civil Rights:

Commission Report Rips Nixon's Record

role in civil rights enforcement, the commission said "the President's posture, as gleaned from his actions and statements over the last six months, has not been such as to provide the clear affirmative policy direction necessary to assure that the full weight of the federal government will be behind the fight to secure equal rights for all minorities."

It warned that "unless the bureaucracy is given to understand that civil rights is a matter of personal concern to the President, it is unlikely to alter the status quo."

For example, the commission noted, "the President's comments opposing busing to facilitate school desegregation, by failing to offer a realistic alternative, may well be interpreted as a sign of a slowdown in the federal desegregation effort."

While the White House fared better than most of the federal agencies in the commission's investigation, it still received a "less than adequate" grade.

Civil rights law enforcement is not an academic exercise, the report stressed. It accused a number of federal agencies of "a lack of effective action" in dealing with continuing discrimination in many areas where the law clearly prohibits it.

"Last June the General Services Administration and the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development announced an agreement to assure availability of housing for lower income families, open without discrimination, in any community in which a federal installation was to be located. It took nearly five months before any regulations were issued, and internal operating instructions still have not been developed. Federal installations still are being located on a business-as-usual basis."

Agencies are quick to announce structural changes that they plan to make, or have just made, the report said, but rarely do they report full implementation of these changes. And measurable improvements in minority living conditions as a result of them are an even greater rarity.

Overall, the commission concluded, in most agencies, changes that must be made will be changes in form, but not in substance.

Many of the criticisms levied by the Commission on Civil Rights had also been made by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in its convention report.

The council charged that during nearly three years of the Nixon Administration "there has been an attempted slowdown in the drive to end segregation and discrimination in American society."

First Rulings Announced by Wage Panels

The nation moved into the second week of Phase 2 of Pres. Nixon's economic stabilization program with only a few of many key questions authoritatively answered.

Initial rulings and interpretations by the various control agencies—the Pay Board, Cost of Living Council and Construction Industry Stabilization Committee—included these decisions:

- Employes paid less than $1.60 an hour, the current federal minimum wage, are exempt from all wage and salary controls. The $1.60 figure applies to farm workers also, even though their minimum pay is only $1.30.
- Longevity increases and automatic progression raises — frozen during the Aug. 15 to Nov. 13 Phase 1 period—were automatically resumed as of Nov. 14 without regard to the 5.5 percent general guideline or any requirement for Pay Board approval of wage increases.
- All construction contracts, regardless of the number of employes involved, that were scheduled to take effect after Aug. 15 or that are subsequently negotiated, must receive approval of the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee before any increases are paid.

This applies also to contracts that had previously been approved by the committee under its own guidelines, which predated the Pay Board standard.

The Construction Industry Stabilization Committee, on being officially delegated authority as of Nov. 14 "to administer the policies of the Pay Board with respect to wages and salaries and other economic adjustments in the building and construction industry," sent the following telegram to unions and contractor associations:

"No economic adjustments provided in the construction industry that were to take effect on or after Aug. 15 can be placed into effect until further notice from this committee. The CISC will consider these matters at its next regular meeting on Saturday, Nov. 20."

Labor Rights Plan Pressed In Oklahoma

Oklahoma City—The Oklahoma AFL-CIO's eighth biennial convention proposed state and national legislation assuring the right of all workers to:

- Join a union, protected by law, in both private and public employment.
- A minimum wage for all, and prevailing wage on all public works projects.
- Adequate workmen's compensation, job safety provisions and unemployment compensation.
- Free education at all levels.
- Equal employment opportunities for all.
- Fair taxation, equal representation at all levels of government, and the full rights of privacy.

In other resolutions, the 300 delegates called for passage of the labor-backed National Health Security bill, legislation to protect workers' pensions, full welfare benefits and state unemployment compensation for workers on strike, the outlawing of strikebreakers in the state, and the establishment of a labor education program by the University of Oklahoma extension service.

The convention re-elected Pres. Henry L. Likes to his fifth two-year term and Sec.-Treas. Ben Hutchinson to his second term. Claude E. Stiles of the Transport Workers, Owasso, was elected vice president, succeeding Harold Z. Nichols.

Eight new members were also elected to the state federation's executive board, which was expanded from 20 to 22 members.

House-Senate Conference Agrees On Comprehensive Child Care Bill

care centers to occupy children of welfare mothers while they go to work or take training.

Committee members worked closely with Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Elliot L. Richardson on the final version of the bill, and Richardson reportedly indicated he would try to sell it to the President.

But a White House meeting between Pres. Nixon and his Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare brought no immediate commitment—and the conference report went to the House and Senate lacking the signatures of three of the five Republican conferees from the Senate side and five of the six House Republicans on the conference committee. All Democrats signed the report.

The members who withheld their signatures are not necessarily committed to fighting final approval of the bill. But the indications are that they are still waiting for the President to make up his mind on the issue.

Votes on final passage are not expected until after the Thanksgiving recess.

Based on a family with two children, the legislation authorizes free child care services—all-day for pre-school children and after-school for other young children—for families with incomes under $4,320 a year.

Families earning above that amount—up to the $6,960 level in the latest Labor Dept. "low" budget—would pay 10 percent of income between $4,320 and $5,916 and 15 percent of income above $5,916.

If there is space available for families with higher incomes, fees and eligibility rules would be set by HEW.

Cities and other jurisdictions could apply for federal funds to cover 80 percent of the cost of the program—although the local share could be paid through services or facilities.

The programs would be administered by non-profit child development councils, half of whose members would come from parents of children in the program.

The child care centers would absorb the present Head Start program and, like it, would be keyed to development and cultural enrichment of the children.

The bill authorizes $100 million for "tooling up" in the current fiscal year, and $2 billion for the following year.

In addition to encouraging the start of new programs, the legislation would make it possible for unions and other non-profit groups already conducting day-care programs to extend their faciltiies to other segments of the community with the help of federal funds.

Unions with large numbers of working mothers, including the Clothing Workers and the Ladies' Garment workers, worked closely with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation in pushing the legislation.

Included in the bill is a two-year extension of the government's anti-poverty programs and establishment of a non-profit legal services corporation for the poor, insulated from politics.

Supporters of the legislation stressed, however, that even if finally approved and signed by the President, the goals will be reached only if Congress follows through with the needed appropriations and the Administration agrees to spend the money.

Labor Dept. Appoints Veterans Rights Aide

Ralph E. Hall, executive director and former national commander of AMVETS, has been named to head the Labor Dept.'s Veterans Reemployment Rights program.

The Selective Service Act gives servicemen the right to return to the jobs they left before entering the armed services.

Up to 65 Weeks:

Longer Jobless Aid Approved by Senate

benefits after the 39 weeks maximum in the present law was exhausted.

The triggering formula is somewhat complicated—a 6 percent unemployment rate in the state computed on the basis of the jobless rate among persons covered by the state's unemployment insurance law, with an additional factor based on the number of persons who have exhausted their benefits and are no longer on the benefit rolls.

Government statisticians provided the AFL-CIO News with the following list of states that, at the present time, would be eligible for 26 additional weeks of unemployment benefits under the provisions of the Senate bill:

Alaska, California, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Puerto Rico, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

The list, of course, could change before any program went into effect, based on improved or worsened levels of unemployment.

The Senate measure provides full federal funding of the extended benefit program until July 1973, and 80 percent federal financing thereafter. The payroll tax paid by employers would be raised slightly to finance the program.

Since the original House tax bill did not deal with unemployment compensation, the fate of the amendment would rest first with a House-Senate conference committee, subject to final approval by the House.

In other major amendments to the tax bill, which was still being considered as the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Senate:

- Voted 40-37 to raise the personal tax exemption to $800 in 1972—as contrasted to $750 in the House bill.
- Rejected, 37-35, an amendment strongly supported by labor that would have repealed the liberalized depreciation tax allowance for business that the Administration put into effect this year and that is written into the House bill as a matter of law.
- Voted, 56-27, a tax credit that could cut as much as $325 a year from the tax bill of persons paying for education of a student beyond high school.

The AFL-CIO has opposed this concept as one that principally aids well-to-do parents sending their children to expensive private colleges at a loss to the Treasury of money that could improve higher education opportunities for all young people.

- Approved, by a series of decisive votes, tax deductions for child care for working parents, both in the home and outside the home. When there is only one working parent, there would be no income limitation. When there are two parents, the full deduction could be claimed if the combined income level were not above $18,000 and some benefits would be available at higher incomes.

Under present law, only low-income families can deduct child care expenses.

- Rejected a labor-backed amendment to delete a proposed tax deferment on export profits.

Central Body Increase Still Below Goals

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Twelve AFL-CIO state central bodies reported membership gains above 10 percent in the two years since the last AFL-CIO convention.

But the federation's Executive Council expressed concern that affiliation with state and local central bodies still is far below the potential.

In the large industrial states with the greatest concentration of union members, affiliation has been relatively constant for a number of years—and at too low a level.

The council report rejected the argument that increasing per capita taxes of state federations has discouraged affiliations.

On the contrary, it noted, most of the states with the biggest increases in affiliated membership have relatively high per capita fees. And "none of the state federations with a low per capita tax has made any significant gains in affiliations."

Stressing the important role of central bodies as the "operating arms of the AFL-CIO," the council termed the problem of affiliations "a vexing and unresolved impediment" to maximum effectiveness.

THE PROGRAM and activities of the Human Resources Development Institute are described to the Building & Construction Trades Dept. convention by HRDI Director Robert McGlotten.

Rail Signalmen Voting On 42-Month Contract

General chairmen of the Railroad Signalmen were scheduled to vote Nov. 20 in Chicago on the ratification of a 42-month contract agreement with the railroad industry after two years of negotiations.

The new contract is retroactive to Jan. 1, 1970 for the nearly 13,000 signalmen and is scheduled to continue through July 1, 1973.

The union had been free to strike since Oct. 1, when a five-month cooling-off period imposed by Congress expired.

The Signalmen walked off their jobs in mid-May after 21 months of fruitless attempts to negotiate a new contract. But Congress stepped in after the strike was less than two days old and ordered the Signalmen back to work.

Pres. Charles J. Chamberlain of the Signalmen told newsmen that the new agreement was "satisfactory." He said, "we got some things we wanted, but not everything."

Some of the terms of the agreement will be subject to Pay Board approval. The union withheld public announcement of the terms until the ratification vote.

In addition to substandard wages, the issues in negotiations included skill inequity adjustments for experienced craftsmen and away-from-home expenses to rectify poor living conditions for signalmen who are lodged in unsanitary camp cars.

Meanwhile, four railroad shopcrafts unions overwhelmingly ratified agreements reached with carriers in October. The four are the Boilermakers, Railway Carmen, Machinists and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The agreements provide for a $1.22 an hour increase for skilled craftsmen between Jan. 1, 1971 and Apr. 1, 1973.

Negotiations are continuing with two other shopcraft unions — the Firemen & Oilers and Sheet Metal Workers—and the railroad industry.

Growth Shown In Membership Of Federation

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The ranks of AFL-CIO unions continued to grow in the two years since the federation's last convention, the Executive Council reported.

Based on the two-year average of per capita payments to the federation on behalf of members in the United States, membership of AFL-CIO unions was 13,177,000 as of Sept. 30. This represented a gain of 172,000 since the report to the 1969 convention.

Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland reported that the federations net worth rose by $4,684,289 over the two-year period ended last June 30. He noted that this substantial increase is directly attributable to the increase in per capita payments adopted at the 1969 convention. It is in line, he said, with projections that surpluses would occur in the years immediately following the per capita boost and would be offset in later years by anticipated increases in operating costs.

Income over the two-year period totaled $30,368,440.89 against expenses of $25,684,151.89. The great bulk of the income—$27,567,169.15—came from per capita taxes paid by national and international unions and organizing committees. Directly affiliated local unions accounted for $2,051,839.20 in per capita taxes, initiation fees and reinstatement fees.

Kirkland's report set forth details of the federation's income and expenses in a dozen statements. A financial report of the trustees of the AFL-CIO Staff Retirement Plan was also contained in the section.

Union Membership Set At 20.7 Million in 1970

Total membership in trade unions and professional employe associations with headquarters in the United States is still on the increase.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reports that membership rose 542,000 between 1968 and 1970 to 22.6 million.

Of the total, 20.7 million were members of labor unions and 1.9 million belonged to employe associations. The great bulk of the gain was among unions which had 20.2 million members in 1968.

In 1970 union and association membership represented 24.7 percent of the total labor force. This was the same as 1969 but a drop from the 25.2 percent level of 1968. Union membership among nonfarm workers, however, rose from 29.6 percent in 1969 to 30.1 percent in 1970. It was 30.5 percent in 1968.

The Labor Dept. survey for 1970 was the first to include professional employe associations which now engage in collective bargaining. To be included, the employe associations also had to represent members in more than one location.

With a gain of almost one-half a million members, organized labor in 1970 was at an all-time high in membership. The pace of the increase, however, was not as rapid as the gains made between 1964-66 when membership rolls grew by 1.1 million or 1966-68 when the increase was 1.0 million.

On a percentage basis, the biggest gainers were the Government Employes, the American Federation of Teachers, the State, County & Municipal Employes, the Retail Clerks, the Communications Workers and the Service Employes.

The number of women in unions rose 342,000 over the two-year span, raising the total to 4.3 million. White collar members, totalling 3.4 million in 1970, rose by 177,000 from 1968.

Membership in the manufacturing sector, where unionization has been strongest, declined by 44,000 between 1968 and 1970. During the same two years, approximately 360,000 employees in non-manufacturing industries were added to union rolls and membership among state and local government employes increased by 143,000.

The information reported by BLS was based on data provided the bureau by 185 national and international unions and by 22 professional and state public employe associations.

Flight Engineers Elect Johnstad To Succeed Gill as President

Lisbon, Portugal—Errol Johnstad was elected president of the Flight Engineers at the union's 23rd annual convention succeeding William A. Gill, Jr.

Johnstad is a former vice president for international affairs and served as vice president of the Pan American chapter for five years. He was elected to a two-year term.

Gill retired after eight years as president of the union.

The convention assailed the Nixon Administration's wage freeze for its adverse effects on FEIA members. Air carriers are being granted "windfall" profits, the 67 delegates pointed out, because the freeze allowed the employers to pocket wage increases due under union contracts.

The union, which represents flight engineers from 13 nations, also condemned crew relief proceedures of French airlines. A convention resolution charged that French air carriers were operating in violation of International Civil Aeronautics Organization air safety standards by relieving flight engineers on long flights with unqualified and uncertified personnel.

The FEIA said the union and its international affiliates "will take any action possible" to prevent the use of such a crew complement in air carrier operations.

Another resolution adopted by the convention stressed the union's strong opposition to the accelerating rate of airline mergers, which it said are self-serving to the air carriers at the expense of convenience to travelers and paid for by the jobs of employes.

The delegates, including 30 representatives from the United States and 37 from 12 other nations, approved an increase in the union's per capita dues from $5 to $6 a month.

In other elections, the convention elected Jack A. Wahle to the new post of vice president for technical affairs and director of air safety. Donald Thielke resigned as vice president for technical affairs.

The convention also re-elected Rafi Porat as vice president for international affairs for a two-year term. Harry S. O'Brien continues as executive vice president and secretary-treasurer.

Nairobi, Kenya, was selected as the site for the FEIA's 24th annual convention next year.

Red Cross Names Two from Labor

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services announced the appointment of two labor liaison men to the staffs of newly formed divisions of the American Red Cross. They are Wallace O. Nelson of the Nebraska-Iowa division and Glen K. Cole of the Alabama-Mississippi division.

Nelson, of Painters Local 109 in Omaha, has been the AFL-CIO Community Services representative with United Community Services of Omaha. Cole is a member of Steelworkers Local 1013 in Fairfield, Ala. He has been vice chairman of the Birmingham AFL-CIO CSC for seven years; a union counsellor, and area manpower representative of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Insttiute.

Sharing in Progress

WE HAVE ALWAYS held to the idea that under this system no one segment of American society could profit or progress for any great length of time at the expense of the rest.

Our philosophy is quite simple—we believe in increased production, we believe in turning out articles that are well made and are turned out under conditions of decent wages. We believe that we should get a share of whatever wealth is created by the system.

And when our productivity goes up, if they install machinery or use any new method to bring up productivity, we say amen, but we want a share of that, we want higher wages.

I think that we should continue to follow that philosophy. In fact, I don't think there is any other philosophy we can follow.

In all this business about the price freeze and wage freeze and our romance with the dictatorships throughout the world we hear nothing out of Washington about the present dilemma that America faces, about the most important item in the economic agenda, and that's jobs. We have 5.2 million people out of work, 2.2 million more than when Mr. Nixon took office and put in his first economic game plan.

In February 1969, he said in effect, "We're going to squeeze the economy, we're going to tighten up on the monetary and fiscal policies, we're going to roll back the money in circulation so business can slow down, and we're doing this to control inflation."

He also said, "We're going to do it without adding to our unemployment," and he put that in writing. In February 1969, he wrote me a letter while the council was meeting here, in which he said that in just so many words, "We are going to bring down the prices, we are going to fight inflation, and we are going to do it without making the American worker pay for it due to increased unemployment."

WELL, BASED ON his track record, we state very frankly that we have no confidence in his ability to run the economy. He didn't do well in '69 and '70 and early '71. But now, of course, we have something new. There is nothing in this plan that is going to bring us any jobs, and I am wondering if he gives any thought to the fact that we have 14 million people on relief, we've got 25.5 million people living below the official poverty level of the government—25.5 million.

We understand that his idea is that all of this country's evils can be cured by increased profits, and he says so. The watchword is profits.

If you've got 14 million people on relief, tell them not to worry, profits are going to take care of them. You've got 25 million Americans living below the official poverty standards of the government, but tell them not to worry, profits are going to take care of them. If your people are not getting wages high enough to live, again profits is the answer.

Our principle is quite simple. We are for progress and we want to share in it. We are for better production and we want our share; and we are for jobs for Americans, for sale of American products that represent decent working conditions and decent wages.

Rerun of America First Script Marks New Foreign Aid Fight

By John P. Roche

IN SEPTEMBER 1939, at the outbreak of World War II, the American Socialist Party issued a vigorous manifesto denouncing the "imperialist war" and calling for American non-intervention. While the Socialists were, of course, in no sense pro-Nazi, they espoused a perfectionist gospel of anti-anti-Nazism. In regard to Adolf Hitler's persecution of the Jews, for example, the Socialists noted that his behavior was abominable, but that it was merely an example of the way imperialists everywhere treated exploited peoples. Just because the Jews were whites, it was suggested, was no reason to rush to their rescue.

The net thrust of the Socialist position was that since all the inequities in this imperfect capitalist world could not be remedied, there was no case for concentrating on the threat of fascism. It justified the paralysis of perfectionism. Which is to say, in the political context of that time, the left wing reinforced right-wing isolationism. Norman Thomas appeared at America First meetings.

When Thomas ran for President in 1940 as the only militant anti-war candidate, money came in from all sorts of odd locations on the political spectrum.

Working in the campaign, I recall a check for $5,000 from a Los Angeles woman who urged Thomas to get on with the business of protecting the nation from the "international Zionist conspiracy." I would like to think it was returned, but have always suspected it was put through the "money washer" in the back room. In 1940, $5,000 was a lot of money and somebody could easily have lost the letter of transmittal. (Norman Thomas would have returned it in 10 seconds.)

Now politics is rather like watching the late-late show except that instead of "The Maltese Falcon" you see a rerun of an antique political script.

The AID appropriation is defeated in the Senate by a weird coalition and the commentators are stunned. Yet it isn't novel: the voice is the voice of Mike Mansfield, but the hands are the hands of Burton K. Wheeler (also from Montana). The voice is the voice of Frank Church, but the hands are the hands of Robert M. LaFollette, Jr. Perhaps the best we can hope for is that Karl Marx was right when he said that history does repeat itself: the first time as tragedy, the second as farce.

It is hardly surprising to see reactionaries behave in character. Thus Sen. J. W. Fulbright's observation that it is absurd to send money abroad when they need sewers in Arkansas, a position that others echoed, has to be understood in the light of his voting record, one of general opposition to domestic liberal programs. There has always been a solid block of senators who have opposed foreign aid because we should be spending the money at home, but who refuse equally to spend it at home.

HOWEVER, what was most depressing was to hear Sen. Church sounding like the late Gerald P. Nye, who with Wheeler was the outstanding liberal isolationist of the 1930s.

Church formally signed off in a speech "Farewell to Foreign Aid," the gist of which was that since we had not saved the world, we should stay home and cultivate our garden. In essence, he said, we had been pouring our money into undemocratic ratholes, utterly failing to develop decent, representative governments among our clients. As is usually the case with this line of argument (see for example, the critiques of the South Vietnamese presidential election) it is hard to know whether Church is sore because we are manipulating other people, or because we are not manipulating them effectively.

The gap between the rich nations and the poor has in fact been widening, but Church has given up trying to cope with that: "Radical revolution," he said, "is the only real hope for development [of poor nations], and the single most helpful thing we can do is to leave them alone."

This is absurd: the most that a "radical revolution" can do for a poor nation is provide a radical environment for starvation and squalor. American aid has in conscience been a pittance.

The liberal answer is to increase it, not to argue that lack of accomplishment is proof that nothing should be attempted.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Meany Reports to Convention:

'Inept Nixon Policies' Carried Nation Down Road to Recession

The following is excerpted from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's report, the opening section of the Report of the AFL-CIO Executive Council to the Ninth Convention.

THIS IS THE SITUATION in America we face as the ninth biennial convention convenes: The economy is in a state of uncentainty. Intolerable high unemployment prevails. The cost of living has not declined. Poverty has increased. The states and major cities are on the brink of bankruptcy.

The nation is in trouble.

We take no satisfaction in the fact that the prediction of the last convention—that America was on the road to recession, while inflation continued unabated—was correct. Millions of American families have suffered and continued to suffer because the policies of the Administration which we criticized, and for which we offered sound alternatives, brought about the very conditions we foresaw.

It was not until Aug. 15, 1971, that the President of the United States moved at all to meet the nation's monumental economic problems. When he finally acted, without apology for past errors, he imposed conditions which were patently unfair and unworkable.

As the basic inequities of the President's program were unfolded, more and more Americans adopted positions of opposition similar to that of the labor movement. Labor was no longer the lone voice of opposition to the Nixon game plan, as political leaders, some commentators, editorialists and cartoonists took up the fight for an economic program that was fair, equitable and workable and insured equality of sacrifice.

This convention, meeting five days after the expiration of the initial 90-day freeze, will make its own judgments of the standards and criteria established by the various boards and commissions set up by the President. The delegates will also want to weigh the effects of the first 2½ years of Nixon economics. These are among some of the results of inept Nixon policies:

- The number of people living in poverty increased for the first time in 10 years.
- State and local governments—deprived of tax revenue by high unemployment and squeezed by high interest rates—were forced to cut back on services. Needed hospitals, medical centers, schools, homes, mass transit systems and roads were not built and the need grew even more severe.
- While the pace of the Vietnam war slowed and American troops were brought home, defense industry production was cut back with no governmental programs ready for reconversion to peacetime needs and no plans for jobs for either ex-GIs or workers laid off in defense plants. In fact, the Administration rejected sound proposals which would have put people back to work.
- The President sequestered $12 billion in funds Congress appropriated that would have provided jobs.
- He vetoed a Public Service Employment bill in December 1970. The 200,000 jobs it would create, he said, were "make work" jobs. In July 1971 he signed and hailed a similar bill, ignoring the fact the 60,000 unemployed workers would already have been employed had he signed the bill in December.
- In one week the President vetoed a $2 billion Accelerated Public Works bill, because, he said, construction workers were leading inflation but, in that same period, refused to use standby authority to control credit and prevent another increase in the prime interest rate at major banks.

The curious priorities of the Nixon Administration are reflected in its vetoes: education funds, construction of hospitals, housing programs, limits on broadcast spending in political campaigns, training of family doctors, pay increases for blue collar federal workers and retirement benefits for federal fire-fighters.

Many other problems have developed that demand our attention.

Traffic in drugs no longer stops at the city line.

Computers invade the private lives of Americans, utterly disregarding the human right to privacy.

The search continues for a just conclusion to the Vietnam war—the longest in this nation's history.

And an uncertain future awaits all America as the President flirts with the Red Chinese.

These are all challenges—domestic and international—that we face as Americans.

In addition, America's unions have their own challenges.

The forces of reaction have not diminished the intensity of their attacks upon the principles of free trade unionism.

We are unjustly blamed for inflation. Some charge we are holding back social progress, while, at the same time, others attack us for pushing too hard for social progress.

In short, we are attacked because the trade union movement refuses to abandon the battle for economic justice and human dignity for all men and refuses, at the same time, to abdicate its leadership role to others. We do no intend to surrender to either group of critics.

AHEAD IS THE ELECTION of 1972. It may be our greatest challenge. The choice is simple:

Do we want an Administration that pursues economic and political policies that favor the few at the expense of needed programs for the many?

Or are we going to work to elect—to Congress, to the White House and to state capitals—leaders of vision and dedication who have a proper concern for the men and women who build America?

All of these problems face us as we convene in national convention. The men and women we are privileged to represent look to us for programs and policies and, above all, actions that will put America back to work and once again set the nation on the path toward progress, peace, security and justice.

It is a trust to which we will be worthy.

Lowest-Paid Are Victims:

Wage-Hour Violations Cost Workers $100 Million a Year

PERSISTENT VIOLATIONS of the federal Wage & Hour Law—often by employers who have "been warned again and again"—cost workers on the lowest end of the pay scale $100 million every year, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald charged.

Sparse enforcement of the law, coupled with rare application of stiff penalties against employers found to be illegally underpaying their workers, are major reasons why wage and hour violations continue to mount, Oswald said.

Most often, he noted, employers are only ordered to "pay what they should have paid in the first place."

Oswald said the minimum wage bill reported by the House Education & Labor Committee would stiffen both enforcement of the law and penalties for violations, in addition to providing a long-overdue improvement of the federal minimum wage.

He urged passage of the measure, pointing out that "about 6 million workers . . . are now in poverty as a result of the very low minimum wage on the books." He stressed that nearly four years of rapidly rising living costs have gone by since the last minimum wage improvement.

QUESTIONED BY REPORTERS on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Oswald said the Phase 2 wage restrictions should not block raising the present $1.60 an hour minimum wage to $2 next year. In fact, he pointed out, the 5.5 percent guidepost set by the Pay Board, "compounded over the four years . . . these workers have been denied" any wage improvement would be "exactly the same."

By Press Associates, Inc.

NOT LONG AGO George C. Guenther, Assistant Secretary of Labor for Occupational Safety & Health, was given the first annual award of the Association of Safety Council Executives "for his excellence as a national leader in the safety movement."

No one can begrudge Mr. Guenther the bronze statuette that goes with the award, but safety and health technicians of the labor movement are inclined to regard its presentation as somewhat premature. They have been far from satisfied with the vigor with which the Labor Dept.'s Occupational Safety & Health Administration (OSHA) has gone about enforcing the new law.

They have challenged Guenther's administration of the law with turning too much power of enforcement over to the states. This is despite the fact that the states have long been delinquent in enforcing their own industrial safety laws. Indeed, the federal law is largely the result of this state delinquency.

What is largely at stake, from the labor viewpoint, is the promptness and determination with which the Safety & Health Act is administered. Guenther has repeatedly protested that he and his administration are doing a top flight job. Labor officials concerned with the problem feel that the job so far is far from satisfactory.

What is indisputable is that the job is immense—even greater than realized during the hearings and debate on the law itself. Proof of that is the report made by OSHA itself on the first five months of its operation.

This shows that OSHA has made 5,633 inspections and has turned up no less than 12,900 violations of the law. There have been 2,159 citations with penalties of $167,346. Some 522 fatal and catastrophic accidents were investigated with no outcome as yet reported.

A NUMBER OF highly significant conclusions can be drawn from this first bare-bones report.

The most obvious is a simple arithmetical one. There are some 4.1 million workplaces in the United States, employing some 57 million workers.

During its first five months of operation, OSHA inspected almost 6,000 for an annual rate of 14,400. Divide that into 4.1 million and you get a total of 284 years to inspect them all.

It would be unreasonable to expect OSHA to inspect every workplace in the United States every year; a certain amount of spot checking is inevitable. Nevertheless, the arithmetic itself presents a valuable lesson in the magnitude of the inspection job and the seriousness with which it must be taken, and the smallness of the effort so far.

There is a very strong tendency on the part of the Nixon Administration to dump as much responsibility as possible back on the states. The "state rule" promulgated by OSHA on Oct. 4 is an example of this.

Under this "rule," states have been entrusted with enforcement of the Safety & Health Act if they come up with a "plan" containing certain "compliance indices" that they are living up to federal standards of safety and health at the workplace. Labor experts in the field are not satisfied that the rule is adequate. They feel it is "too loose" and "too permissive."

State plans can be approved on a promise of performance, rather than on the test of performance itself. The authority of union representatives in participating in inspections is too narrow. It may be as long as three years before an inadequate state plan is finally caught up with.

Labor safety experts are not opposed to the use of state resources in the fight for safety and health. But in view of the history of state failure to deal with the problem, they feel that states should be held strictly to standards that are equal if not superior to those of the federal government.

The job, obviously, is vast, too vast for anything less than the toughest kind of action.

MORE ENFORCEMENT and stiffer penalties could help curb "persistent violations" of the minimum wage law that now cost low-wage workers $100 million a year, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald, center, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Jame F. Welsh, left, of the Washington Evening Star and Donald Finley of United Press International. The public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

FIRST LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCE of the newly-merged American Postal Workers Union drew 2,000 delegates to Washington for a four-day program of workshops and lobbying. Workshops focused on the union's nationwide contract with the U.S. Postal Service. Visits to congressional offices built support for legislation to give postal workers the right to strike. Here, APWU Pres. Francis S. Filbey and other officers welcome the delegates.

Public Employes, Farm Workers Post Dramatic Organizing Gains

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Big gains in public employe organizing and new breakthroughs among farm workers were the bright spots in trade union organization during the past two years, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported to the convention.

But these gains were not matched in the private, non-farm sector of the economy, the council noted.

National Labor Relations Board statistics show that unions were involved in fewer representation elections and won a smaller percentage of elections than during the previous two years. The number of workers in newly-organized units averaged 2,000-a-month below the 1967-69 pace.

In a frank discussion of organizing progress and problems, the Executive Council summed up:

"While public employes and agricultural workers, without a labor law and labor board, had their two best union organizational years, the private sector, with a law and a board, suffered two of its worst."

The public sector gains carry on a decade of dramatic union growth—a catch-up to the organizing surge in the private sector during the 1930s and 1940s.

This has been accompanied by a "militant unwillingness" by public employes "to accept any longer a status of second-class unionism or no unionism, simply because they are public employes."

In the farm sector, after decades of uphill struggle, there has come firm evidence that union organization has sunk deep roots.

"For the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, 1970 was a year of dramatic accomplishment," the Executive Council noted.

After more than four years of struggle, the major table grape producers were brought under contract, and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was able to announce the end of the grape boycott.

A new organizing drive in vegetable crops shows promise of equally important gains throughout the West, the report observed.

The council took a hard look at the factors slowing organizational growth in the private sector.

These include:

- A tough anti-union campaign by holdout employers, who increasingly hire "skilled and sophisticated union-busters" as "labor consultants" who are paid to keep workers from organizing.
- An administration, "responsive to the interests of big business," that is engaged in packing the NLRB with appointees who can be expected to reflect "an anti-union, pro-employer, interpretation and administration of the labor act."

Under similar circumstances during the Eisenhower Administration, the council noted, "trade union growth in the private sector fell to its lowest point, unfair labor practice complaints issued by the NLRB against unions rose to their highest point, and similar complaints issued by the NLRB against management fell to their lowest point."

- The changing nature of the work force, continuing a trend of slow growth or cutbacks in job categories that are strongly unionized and expansion in white collar and service fields where organization has been lowest.

The council report cited continued efforts and progress in reaching younger workers and in organizing among minority group workers.

And it stressed the need for union organizing efforts to overcome the geographical imbalance that finds 70 percent of union membership concentrated in only 10 states—and 50 percent of the unorganized potential in the other 40 states.

The report also stresses the value of coordinated organizing programs by various unions in geographical areas or in industries, with the AFL-CIO's own organizing staff providing leadership.

"The organizing of unorganized workers continues as a major objective and constant concern of the family of unions that make up the AFL-CIO," the council declared.

Mortgage Investments Urged for Union Funds

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Union treasury funds and labor-management pension trusts can play a key role in financing the construction of low- and moderate-income housing, the Executive Council stressed in its report to the convention.

Too often, managers of these funds have depended heavily on stock market purchases for their investment portfolios while ignoring government-insured mortgage investments, the council noted.

The AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust, established by the federation in 1964, offers affiliates and labor-management pension funds investments in insured mortgage programs. The trust not only provides a high degree of security and reasonable yield on investments, the council pointed out, but it also helps create new union jobs and spurs housing construction.

Although private pension funds were estimated at $136 billion in 1970, the council said that less than 5 percent of the assets were invested in mortgage loans.

"Pension funds have in a relatively few years become a major force in determining the future course of the economy," the council pointed out.

How and where these funds are invested carry much weight and influence the savings-investment process. The responsibilities of the decision makers "will hopefully go beyond a mere balancing of liquidity with maximum return and minimum risk," the council stressed.

It cited the wide-ranging benefits of government insured construction financing and permanent mortgage loans "where the multiplier effect is more efficient and new jobs are created throughout various sectors of the economy."

The council also noted that the recent performance of the stock market has caused the investors of union money to question "whether or not pension funds may have contributed to the trend of simply bidding up stock prices to eventual collapse."

Stocks and bonds have their place in an investment portfolio, the council said. But it pointed out that government insured mortgage loans have historically produced better yields than corporate bonds, and at the same time serve a socially-useful purpose.

20,000 Certified For Trade Act Aid

Since December 1969, about 20,000 U.S. workers have been certified eligible for assistance under the 1962 Trade Expansion Act, the Labor Dept. said.

These are people who have lost their jobs due to increased imports.

Funds Unused, Needs Unmet:

Urban Crisis Grows As Nixon Stalls Aid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The nation's urban crisis continues to grow with high unemployment, increasing poverty rolls and the scarcity of adequate housing, the Executive Council declared.

The urgent need for public facilities and vital services remains unmet even though the federal government more than tripled its categorical grants to state and local governments over the past decade.

And the Nixon Administration is now backing away from these priorities, the council said.

While many states and cities are floundering near bankruptcy and unable to attack the crisis, the council pointed out that the Administration has failed to make use of funds already appropriated for social programs to ease their problems.

The report noted that, instead, the Administration has proposed a no-strings revenue-sharing plan with no performance standards that would allow wealthy cities to share federal funds equally with cities in crisis.

In the inner city ghettos, the council noted, the outcry is not what it was in the summers of 1967 and 1968, "but there are quieter, more ominous symptoms of deterioration."

It cited these grim statistics:

- Unemployment in 1970 jumped to the highest level in 10 years.
- 1970 was the first year in nine years that the take home pay of the average American worker was below the average of the previous year.
- Welfare rolls climbed to the highest level in history.
- Residential mortgage rates were the highest in 100 years.

"In response," the council said, "the Administration has asked the wage earner and the poor to tighten their belts to pay for tax credits and special programs for big business in a classic return to 'trickle-down economics' while the government withholds funds from vital domestic programs."

The real urban crisis is a part of the failures of the current national economic policy, the council stressed. The result is a retreat from the traditional American promise to reduce the ranks of the poor, create an economic climate for the wage earner to improve his standard of living and to better the quality of the American environment.

Any program that would deal with the nation's social problems must come to grips with the need for public and private funds that would finance projects to improve the well-being of all citizens in both urban and rural communities, the council said.

It stressed the role of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, which is charged with the responsibility of dealing with urban problems in the areas of jobs, housing and financing mortgages for low and moderate income housing.

The functions are delegated to the federation's Human Resources Development Institute, the Housing Committee and the Mortgage Investment Trust.

HRDI was established three years ago to encourage and aid federation affiliates in becoming directly involved in manpower training and job placement programs.

Working under a Labor Dept. contract, HRDI has set up nearly 50 offices at key job centers across the country. Each office is manned by a full-time HRDI staff representative who works closely with local and state central labor bodies and local unions in the area.

HRDI has been involved in the Job Opportunities in the Business sector (JOBS) program, a major training project of the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration.

Between October 1970 and June 1971, HRDI staff members assisted in developing JOBS training contracts for 7,898 workers with 373 companies that involved 214 local unions.

Other manpower operations in which HRDI participates include the Jobs Optional Program, Summer Youth Employment programs, Public Service Career programs and the Buddy Program, in which a union volunteer provides personal on-the-job assistance to a newly hired disadvantaged worker.

The federation's new Veterans' Assistance Program is also handled by the 80-member HRDI staff. The program's current operations are focused on the West Coast to help returning Vietnam servicemen find suitable jobs or appropriate training in their home communities with the aid of local labor organizations.

Three Mergers Bolster Strength of Affiliates

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Three mergers involving AFL-CIO affiliates were reported to the federation's convention by the Executive Council. Two of them brought into the AFL-CIO previously unaffiliated unions.

The most recent was the creation of the American Postal Workers Union by the merger of the former Postal Clerks, Special Delivery Messengers and Post Office Maintenance Employes, all AFL-CIO affiliates, and the unaffiliated National Postal Union.

During 1970, the council approved the merger of the AFL-CIO American Bakery & Confectionery Workers and the previously unaffiliated Bakery & Confectionery Workers. The new union took the latter title as an AFL-CIO affiliate.

That same year, the Stone & Allied Products Workers became a part of the Steelworkers through a merger agreement.

In all cases, the council approved the mergers with the understanding that the jurisdiction of the new organization would be the same as the jurisdiction previously held by the separate unions.

The council also noted the issuance of a charter to the new School Administrators & Supervisors Organizing Committee.

And it reported the reaffiliation to the AFL-CIO of the Chemical Workers with the note that "we are happy, also, to welcome these members back into the ranks of the AFL-CIO." The union applied for reinstatement of its AFL-CIO charter after withdrawing from the Alliance for Labor Action.

Top Economic Priority:

Full Employment Program Called Key to Full Recovery

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The task of turning the American economy around from "recession and stretched-out stagnation" will be great, but not impossible if more jobs are made the No. 1 economic priority, the Executive Council reported to the convention.

"By mid-1971," the council said, "there were approximately 5 million unemployed, normal yearly expansion of the labor force was 1.5 million, tens of thousands of GIs were returning to civilian life, and several hundred thousand people had stopped looking for work, after weeks or months of a fruitless job search.

"Therefore, 1.5 million new jobs were needed in the next 12 months, merely to keep unemployment from rising. In order to make a significant dent in the high level of joblessness, 2.5 to 3 million new jobs were required within 12 months—a larger employment increase than in any single year of the 1960s," the report declared.

To start the economy on the road to full employment, the Executive Council said, would require a sharp increase in the real volume of total national production of about 7 percent or more in the next year, with a similar rise required in the succeeding 12-month period.

In outlining the economic failures of the Nixon Administration, the council noted that "after 34 months of a government-engineered slowdown, recession, sluggishness and sudden shift in 'game plans,' the American economy needs comprehensive policies and programs for a decisive and sustained lift."

"Tax bonanzas for big business will not quickly reduce high unemployment and boost industry's operating rate," the council declared.

"What is needed is a program of decisive government measures to create jobs, to boost sales and production, to curb inflationary pressures on costs and prices and to restore the confidence of consumers and business in their economic future."

The council turned to the economic history of the 1960s to underscore the importance of stimulating the economy—into full production and full employment.

"It required real economic expansion of 6.5 percent, between 1961 and 1962, to reduce unemployment significantly and to increase industry's rate of capacity utilization. When the rise of real national output slowed to 4 percent in 1963, unemployment moved up and industry's rate of capacity utilization improved only slightly.

"In 1963, the unemployment rate was 5.7 percent of the labor force—less than in mid-1971. Yet it took decisive and massive government measures to reduce the unemployment rate by 1965, not to full employment, but down to 4.5 percent—and to increase industry's capacity utilization from 83 percent to over 88 percent."

The council pointed out that even this slight improvement in the economic picture of the early '60s required "a massive fiscal policy stimulus—a huge $14 billion cut in taxes, while federal expenditures increased, manpower training programs were pursued and the nation's money supply grew."

As compared to the '60s, the task of turning the economy around in mid-1971 looked far more difficult, the council said.

"The labor force was growing more rapidly. Defense production and the size of the armed forces were being cut. There was a much greater volume of idle plants and machines. A greater number of new jobs were needed. And there was much less confidence among the American people in the state of economic affairs."

Yet the Administration rejected proposals for a series of measures to lift the economy, to create jobs and increase industrial capacity through greater public investment, the council noted.

"And the Administration also refused to use the authority delegated by Congress in December 1969 to establish selective credit controls, interest rate ceilings and the allocation of available credit. Long-term interest rates turned up in May, and the banks boosted the prime interest rate from 5.5 percent to 6 percent in July—increasing costs and prices throughout the economy and discouraging the needed economic expansion."

"So the economy limped along in the summer of 1971, in a state of prolonged stagnation, with weakness or only modest strength in nearly every major sector. Inflation continued and there was danger of a continued slow rise of unemployment."

The report from the Executive Council acknowledged that the Nixon Administration inherited many of the economic problems of the 1960s, but declared that it had also managed to make them worse.

Moreover, there was no classical inflationary condition of too many dollars chasing after too few goods "that could possibly justify putting the American economy through such a tight wringer."

The council gave as an example of the tight-money policy, the increases in the government's FHA and VA mortgage rates from 7.5 percent to 8.5 percent in January 1970.

"On a 30-year, $28,000 mortgage, that rise in the mortgage rate increased monthly payments . . . by about 10 percent—to be paid each and every month for 30 years. Over the 30-year life of the mortgage, that increase alone will be approximately $5,000—more than the total wages and fringe benefits of the construction workers who built the house," the report continued.

"These discriminatory consequences of the Administration's policies also brought a general recession. Urgently needed home building dropped, consumers cut their purchases of expensive items, and smaller businesses, as well as state and local governments, postponed projects.

"Workers were hit by rising unemployment, cuts in working hours and accelerated increases in living costs—by a combination of inflation and recession."

Massive Loss of Jobs Laid to Trade Position

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The massive loss of American jobs from the deteriorating U.S. position in world trade is worse than it was six years ago when the AFL-CIO started calling attention to it, the Executive Council reported to the convention.

And the United States is no closer to tackling the root causes of the job loss than it was then, the council said. As a framework for the action the AFL-CIO has been proposing, the council repeated the sources of the trouble:

- The failure of the U.S. trade position to stabilize after the economic recovery of Germany and Japan in the early 1950s.
- The spread of managed national economies.
- The emergence of trade blocs, such as the Common Market, with preferential treatment for members to the exclusion of the rest of the world.
- The internationalization of technology, with U.S. firms investing in foreign countries under licensing arrangements, patent agreements and similar exporting of technology, which was often developed with taxpayers' money.
- The rapid spread of multinational corporations, usually based in the United States but answerable to no government.

These factors taken together, have prompted the AFL-CIO to summarize that "the fact that other nations have higher and often prohibitive barriers against U.S. exports, while the United States is a relatively open market for industrial goods means that the multinational companies can have relatively free rein both abroad and at home, while U.S. workers' jobs and incomes and U.S. communities pay the price."

Repeatedly in the last two years, the AFL-CIO has called for such corrective measures as revisions in accounting requirements and tax laws to meet the problem of tax avoidance by multinational firms; supervision of outflows of U.S. capital and technology; reversal of government encouragement of the export of technology; development of international fair labor standards; reporting of wages paid abroad by U.S. business; modernization of existing tariff, trade and anti-dumping laws; quotas on imports, with some exemptions and provision for growth.

But virtually no action has been taken, the coucil reported, citing the events of 1970—when a trade bill was not passed—as typical.

That year, the Administration sought to encourage exports through subsidies to big business, and the Tariff Commission completed a year-long study by recommending the retention of the "off shore" processing tariff provisions which the AFL-CIO had opposed since 1967.

Most recently, the council noted, the Administration's proposals of August 1971 have included a broader tax, which is at best a stopgap measure, while attempting to revive the export subsidy giveaway and "studiously avoiding" taxes on licensing and patent agreements and on overseas profits of U.S. corporations.

Gains at Bargaining Table Erased As Workers' Buying Power Sags

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The inflationary trends of the past five years are continuing to rob American workers of the wages and fringe benefits won at the bargaining table to the point that the buying power of the average worker's real take-home pay is less than it was in 1965, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported to the convention.

And, "despite the outcries in the news media about the size of collective bargaining settlements—and there have been some very large ones—the overwhelming majority have been modest, in the face of the accelerated rise of living costs," the council said.

It pointed out that the cumulative increase in the cost of living from 1967 to 1970 was 16.2 percent, and that in the 1968-1970 period the increase was 11.5 percent.

In 1970, average wage gains were about 6.2 percent, just barely ahead of the 5.9 percent increase in living costs, leaving the average nonsupervisory worker with gross weekly earnings of $119.78, according to the Labor Dept.

At the same time, the council noted, Labor Dept. studies show that it costs $10,664 before tax payments, or $205 weekly, for a typical urban family of four to maintain "a modest but adequate" standard of living.

Even the Labor Dept.'s lower budget for such a family, with some amenities but no luxuries, amounts to $134 a week, or $6,960 annually, the council report noted. And both figures assumed that the family breadwinner employe is fortunate enough to work 52 weeks a year.

The report went on to observe that despite the Nixon Administration's contention that wage increases have been out of line, Census Bureau figures show that the median earnings of many workers fall far below the Labor Dept.'s family budget standards.

"Midpoint earnings, before taxes, of those male wage earners who were fortunate enough to work full-time in 1970 were only about $6,462 for the unskilled, $7,644 for the semiskilled, $9,253 for skilled craftsmen, $9,765 for sales workers and $11,937 for professional and technical workers," the council said.

"So most wage and salary earners were hard-pressed in their attempt to reach and maintain sufficient earnings for a modest standard of living, at recent prices, from their regular job."

"Workers and their families need wage and salary increases to maintain and improve their real incomes," the report continued. "The national economy needs increased workers' buying power to boost consumer expenditures, which account for almost two-thirds of total national production—to lift the economy out of sluggishness.

"Had unions in the past two years failed to gain larger wage settlements than in the early 1960s, both consumer buying power and the state of the national economy would have been weaker."

16 More Locals Affiliate With Internationals

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The number of local unions directly chartered by the AFL-CIO declined in the two years since the last convention, continuing a trend.

But the Executive Council report also showed that the 156 remaining directly-affiliated locals had 61,850 members, higher than the 53,300 membership of the 187 direct affiliates two years ago.

The council reported that during the two-year period 16 local unions with a membership of 2,063 chose to affiliate with national or international unions. The motive, the report said, was the desire of the union members involved for active participation in the affairs of a larger body with interests and industry jurisdiction similar to theirs.

Fifteen small locals with a total membership of 569 disbanded during this period, one local of seven members had its charter revoked, and one local was reinstated.

The council report also showed central bodies in all 50 states and 742 local central bodies, down from 765 two years ago.

Vetoes, Fund Cutbacks Extend Schools' Crisis

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The continuing crisis in public education has been dealt a "succession of blows" by the Nixon Administration which "threaten to destroy" the hard-won gains of the last decade, the Executive Council declared in its report to the convention.

The council charged that the Administration, through the use of presidential vetoes and spending cutbacks, had managed to "create a new crisis of even greater proportions" than that which confronted the nation's schools in the early 1960s.

The report recalled that the AFL-CIO had warned of an impending disaster in education in 1963. And Congress responded with the passage of the Vocational Education Act, the Higher Education Facilities Act, the Elementary & Secondary Education Act, the Higher Education Act and a host of other laws designed to upgrade American education.

But the current Administration has curtailed the effectiveness of these laws, the council said, by refusing to spend the funds Congress has authorized to carry them out.

The report observed that although college enrollment more than doubled during the 1960s, federal expenditures to aid higher education were 48 percent of the authorization in 1969, 27 percent in 1970 and 29 percent in 1971.

The council did not disagree with the Administration's contention that "money is not the only answer," but charged that Pres. Nixon is naive if he believes that solving the shortcomings of the schools does not "involve adequate funding."

The report noted that the Administration has recently proposed reorganization of the various federal programs of aid to education into a vague program of education grants to the states to be spent within five broadly defined "national purpose" areas.

But the Administration plan would leave the spending of these funds wide open to local and state political pressures, the council charged, and local needs in education are not always identical with local political needs. It was for precisely this reason that Congress had reacted to specific educational needs that had been neglected by state and local authorities, the council said.

It noted that vocational education, education of the economically disadvantaged and of the handicapped had fallen into a deplorable state in most communities across the nation before Congress established specific aid programs in these areas.

The "block grant" proposals, the council said, would wipe out hard-won progress and be a "step backward."

The council also reiterated labor's firm opposition to proposals for educational performance contracting and the educational voucher plan.

Performance contracting involves the use of private firms which guarantee the attainment of a certain level by students as a condition of full payment. But education "is concerned with the growth and development of the individual," the council declared and such guarantees offer only a false hope.

The voucher plan would provide funds for parents to buy education from their choice of public or private schools and would thus compound the inequities in many school systems, the council said.

The Administration was also accused of a lack of enthusiasm in encouraging school desegration, paying lip service to it but failing to match words with needed funds.

In the area of trade union education, the council said the needs of AFL-CIO affiliates have reached massive proportions as a result of the increasingly formidable challenges posed for trade unionists by a rapidly changing society, complex new laws, and the expanded interests of the labor movement.

Present resources, the report said, fail to meet the need for continuous well-planned, short-term labor education programs. University labor education centers are often underfunded and are few and far between. New techniques and education methods must be explored for future education programs, the

It noted that the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, now in its third year of operation, has made great strides in improving the skills of all who have passed through its doors, but it is obvious that more unionists must be reached.

The report cited long-range plans to expand the Labor Studies Center, but stressed that basic to the continued growth and success of the center is the adoption of a scholarship program devised to insure the participation of all affiliates.

Alternatives Fall Short of Need:

National Health Security Termed Labor's Top Goal

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A comprehensive national health care program that will meet the needs of all the American people remains the prime legislative goal of the labor movement, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported.

The council listed the key ingredients of the health crisis the nation faces—escalating costs, the shortage of doctors and other health professionals, and the gross maldistribution of health manpower and facilities.

And it stressed that the National Health Security bill supported by the labor movement is the only full-scale answer to these problems. Every alternative proposal that has been offered falls short of the need.

The council's report welcomed the growing recognition that the nation does face a health care crisis — something the labor movement has been aware of for many years.

In fact, the council noted, an AFL-CIO Executive Council statement in 1967 remains a valid statement of the nature of the problem.

"The major health problems facing America," the council said four years ago, "have been the runaway costs of care and the failure of the prevailing fee-for-service system to deliver adequate care to many people. This deficiency is general, but it is most acute in the urban and rural poverty areas."

The problems of health care have not subsided, and even Pres. Nixon, last year, conceded that the country faces a massive health care crisis, the council pointed out.

Disorganization prevails in the health care industry, the council said. "Every solo-practice medical or dental practioner is accountable only to himself," while "every hospital or other health facility operates as an independent empire with little or no regard to the necessary relationships to other institutions."

"The result is enormous waste, high costs and poor and inefficient service," the council said.

The nation no longer can tolerate this non-system that is "so costly in lives, suffering and money," it stressed.

The private health insurance industry, including Blue Cross and Blue Shield, has largely ignored the problem the council charged. In fact, by not acting either to control costs or improve the quality of medical care, the insurance industry has become a part of the problem—not a part of the solution of the health care crisis.

"Patchwork solutions to the health crisis are no longer viable," the council said. "Only a complete restructuring of the delivery system can bring the benefits of medical science to the people."

Early enactment of the Kennedy-Griffith Health Security bill, which emerged from earlier measures endorsed by labor organizations, is the answer the medical care crisis, the council advised.

But other federal programs must be continued because they will complement Health Security, the council said. It cited health facility construction, health manpower and other efforts to stimulate the development of prepaid group practice plans.

The council also stressed the need to improve the quality of life for the elderly though increases of benefits in social security.

It termed the Administration's opposition to meaningful improvements "indefensible."

While Congress last year voted a 10 percent increase in benefits over the opposition of the Administration, this was only a stop-gap measure, the council said. "There is a dire need for another substantial benefits increase and the AFL-CIO intends to work vigorously to raise the inadequate 5 percent" increase provided in a current bill, the council stressed.

As for welfare reform, the council welcomed the recognition by the President of the grave weaknesses in the present system—"a hodgepodge of federal-state-local administration that has been more and more costly to taxpayers while denying most recipients even a bare minimum level of living."

But it criticized the inadequacies of the Administration's plan and especially the lack of assurance of adequate income for those unable to work and jobs at no less than the minimum wage for those who can.

High levels of unemployment and inadequate jobless benefits have caused extreme burdens on workers in recent years, the council noted. Congress made some improvements in unemployment compensation programs last year, but additional action is needed to meet AFL-CIO goals.

The failure to establish minimum federal benefit standards was the most serious deficiency of the legislation, the council said.

Labor is convinced, the council stressed, that the poor record of most states demands "a stronger federal role in the unemployment insurance system."

Council Hails COPE's 1970 Record But Stresses New Challenge Ahead

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council gave high praise to the performance of COPE, the federation's political arm, during the 1970 elections. But its report to the convention warned that organized labor faces new challenges and a new test of its political effectiveness in 1972.

The council noted that Pres. Nixon is regarded as "vulnerable" in next year's national election, largely because of the continually rising unemployment and inflation the Administration's economic policies have fostered over the past two years

"However, any repeat of the Democratic in-fighting of 1968 would sap the initial advantage Democrats now appear to have," the council said.

It predicted, too, that a third-party candidacy by Alabama Gov. George Wallace is likely to be a part of the presidential picture again in 1972 as it was in 1968. If so, the council said, labor will again be forced to fight on a "second front" through an educational campaign among its members.

A major new factor in next year's voting, the report noted, will be the 11 million potential voters in the 18-20 year age range.

The council observed that most of the speculation regarding the political impact of this new group of voters has centered on the college population, overlooking the fact that most 18-20-year-olds are not in school.

"Four million in this age group are working; 1.5 million are housewives and 800,000 are in the armed forces. Many are our members. Many more are offspring of union members either living at home, at school, in the armed forces or married and living away from their parents."

The 1972 elections will also include important House and Senate races, the report pointed out. Only a handful of labor's friends among the senators up for re-election are in races considered "marginal," but more than 50 friendly congressmen face difficult contests.

Reviewing COPE's performance in 1970, the report said: "In terms of funding, manpower, communications, registration and get-out-the-vote apparatus, and precinct-level organization — by any yardstick, 1970 was labor's finest campaign effort."

The council saw testimony to the effectiveness of these efforts in the millions of union members added to the voting rolls through labor's nationwide registration effort and in the high percentage of COPE-endorsed candidates winning election victories.

It drew these conclusions from the 1970 campaign:

- "The labor movement's political programs mature and increase in effectiveness with each campaign.
- "Union members, by their votes, showed again—as they had in 1968 by voting overwhelmingly for our endorsed presidential candidate—that they vote their genuine interests, not their interests as defined by demagogues. An open effort was made by the Administration and its candidates to appeal to passions it felt were widespread in workers' ranks. In one Senate race after another, new lows were reached in the conservatives' use of the politics of hate and fear. But, union members—provided by their unions with the facts on issues and candidates—rejected the demagogues.
- "These facts together provide hopeful signs that 1972 will produce even more successful results at the polls."

HEW Issues Ban On Lead Paint

The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has announced plans to ban the use of lead-based paint in federally financed housing, including housing constructed with VA or FHA mortgage loans.

A 1970 law prohibits lead-based paint in federally-assisted housing and the deparment's proposed rule will take effect unless modified as the result of comments required within 30 days. The law bars use of paint with more than one percent lead.

The intent of the law is to protect children who eat chips of lead-based paint in dilapidated housing. Lead poisoning in children can cause mental retardadition and death.

Loopholes Persist:

Tax Reform Found Far From Complete

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The task of tax reform is far from complete at the federal level and has barely begun in most states and cities, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared in its report to the convention.

It noted some significant progress since the federation's last convention—through the 1969 tax reform legislation.

But that law only partially closed most loopholes, and the federal tax structure still is "rigged against wages and salaries" and "rigged in favor of unearned income."

As for states and cities, the council found little improvement over the past two years.

"Unfair sales taxes still remain the principal revenue source of the states, accounting for 60 percent of state tax receipts." And, the council report noted, "cities depend on property taxes for 85 percent of their tax take."

By contrast, "income taxes account for only 15 percent of the total tax revenues of state and local governments." And, with few exceptions, state income taxes are not progressive assessments based on ability to pay, and most local government income taxes "do not reach the investment income of the wealthy, nor do they take into account dependents and other family circumstances which affect ability to pay."

Because the federal tax structure, despite its weaknesses, is fairer than most state taxes, the council reiterated labor's strong support for federal grants to states and cities for needed programs. It cited also the fact that "many public needs involve nationwide social issues, such as education and welfare," while others cross state boundary lines, such as highways, pollution control, manpower training and regional development.

While strongly reaffirming the need for increased federal funding of these and similar programs, the council maintained labor's continued opposition to the "no-strings revenue-sharing proposals" of the Nixon Administration.

The President's revenue-sharing proposals, it said, "represent wasteful and insufficient methods of dispensing critically needed federal aid. They would shortchange the nation's urban areas, and would preclude effective enforcement of national performance standards."

The Executive Council report accused the Administration of sabotaging genuine tax reform while attempting "to heap more of the tax burden upon the shoulders of wage and salary earners and redistribute still greater shares of the nation's income and wealth to those who need it least."

It cited chapter and verse of the various tax proposals and administrative actions taken by the Nixon Administration to document the charge. Repeatedly, the examples proved, the Administration has tried to cut taxes and open new loopholes for businesses and wealthy individuals—which would have the effect of increasing the proportionate burden on low and middle-income families.

Although the Administration has not taken the final step of actually advocating a "value-added" tax—a sophisticated name for a national sales tax—its spokesmen have repeatedly sent up trial balloons indicating that such a proposal is definitely being considered.

"The AFL-CIO has opposed these attempts to add to the inequities in the tax structure," the council report stressed, "and we will continue to do so."

Legislative Progress Hampered By Stiff White House Resistance

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A "modest record of legislative accomplishments" in the two years since the last AFL-CIO convention would have been "far better" if Congress didn't have to battle with the Nixon Administration for every inch of progress, the Executive Council reported to the convention.

There were some significant gains. Major, labor-backed bills that became law in the past two years include:

- An Occupational Safety & Health Act, the culmination of years of effort by the entire labor movement.
- A comprehensive tax reform law that took the first step toward the still-unfinished task of equalizing the tax burden and closing loopholes.
- Extension of the Voting Rights Act without weakening amendments, coupled with the 18-year-old vote.
- A public service employment program.
- The Housing & Communities Development Act.

"For the record," the council stressed, "it should be noted that in every instance—at one time or another—the Nixon Administration opposed each of these measures."

Not every battle between Congress and the President, unfortunately, ended with the enactment of needed legislation.

The council report charges Nixon with "placing political aims ahead of social and economic needs" in his repeated use of the veto.

Thus, the President's disapproval killed a series of appropriations bills for health and housing programs, blocked an earlier comprehensive manpower bill, denied a pay raise and a voice in wage-setting procedures to the government's blue-collar workers, and prevented enactment of a federal fire fighters retirement bill, accelerated public works legislation, a family medical practice bill and campaign spending limitations.

Only on hospital construction legislation and the 1971 education appropriations was Congress able to muster the two-thirds majority needed to override a presidential veto.

In some areas, labor's legislative efforts had to be devoted to the defeat of harmful legislation—and nominations.

The fight against the Administration's emergency disputes plan for the transportation industry—including a form of compulsory arbitration—is still going on.

And repeated nominations of unfit persons for high office have become a Nixon trademark.

At the time of the 1969 AFL-CIO convention, the nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court was before the Senate—and the delegates in a scathing resolution expressed labor's outrage.

One month later, in a stunning 55-45 vote, the Senate rejected the nomination.

Perhaps the most telling comment came from Attorney Gen. John N. Mitchell, who had recommended the appointment despite the known opposition of labor and civil rights groups.

Mitchell told newsmen that he assumed that unions "would not be overjoyed" with the nomination, "but I didn't think they would mount such a nationwide campaign against him."

The sequel came with the follow-up nomination of G. Harrold Carswell. The council report relates that "from the outset the AFL-CIO and other liberal, civil rights groups strongly opposed this nomination," And it recounts the legislative history, ending in the Senate's 51-45 rejection of the nomination.

The council report's 60-page section on national legislation recounts the detailed record of Congress on the bills that labor supported and opposed.

There were areas of inaction or incomplete action on legislation the AFL-CIO considered urgently needed. And there were compromises that diluted the value of needed legislation.

Thus, there were bright hopes that Congress would send to the states a constitutional amendment to abolish the Electoral College and provide for direct popular election of the President.

Such an amendment passed the House by a 339-70 majority. But it was killed by a filibuster in the Senate. And when the 92nd Congress convened, the Executive Council noted, another filibuster killed an effort to reduce the number of senators needed to close debate.

At the 1969 AFL-CIO convention, the need for a higher minimum wage and broader coverage was stressed repeatedly. Yet, the council report notes, improvement in the Fair Labor Standards Act is still on the unfinished business list of Congress.

And the battle over trade legislation to halt the outflow of U.S. jobs, capital and technology still was continuing as the AFL-CIO's ninth convention got under way.

Labor Role Held Vital In Enforcing Safety Act

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Serious questions continue to arise over the federal government's policies and conduct in implementing the new occupational safety law, the Executive Council declared in its report to the convention.

The council expressed concern that the Departments of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare are not carrying out their full responsibilities under the act.

It had become apparent to organized labor over the past several months that the Occupaional Safety & Health Administration was attempting to turn back enforcement authority to the states, despite their generally poor record on job safety in the past.

Recognizing the adverse effects that would result from this development, the council cited the need for unions to take a major role in overseeing proper enforcement. It added another caveat: inadequate funding restricting both state and federal performance.

Hence, organized labor must shoulder much of the responsibility if the full potential of the new job safety law is to be realized, the council declared.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates have launched a program to achieve adequate appropriations, manpower and enforcement at the federal level. Labor organizations also are watching closely to make sure states live up to their responsibilities under the act.

The council stressed that the role of labor organizations is particularly important because the federal government and the states will not be equipped to mount more than prototype safety programs for some time.

Tracing labor's campaign for the passage of the act, the council recalled its statement of February 1970: "The issue is no longer whether or not any legislation should be adopted, but what kind of legislation."

After an effective bill emerged in the House in August 1970, the Nixon Administration sought to get a weaker substitute measure passed with the support of the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

But most of the provisions of the stronger bill were retained in the final act. The council hailed it "as constituting a major victory for every American worker."

Labor Dept. Names Regional Director

Dr. Edward A. Augirre has been appointed to a new position of regional director for the Dept. of Labor in San Francisco.

Augirre will head department operations in California, Nevada, Arizona, Hawaii and Guam.

Continued Growth Cited In Community Services

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Continued growth has marked the progress of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services in the past two years with 181 fulltime CSA representatives now functioning in 140 communities.

The growth, reported to the convention by the federation's Executive Council, has helped in the development of programs to meet the personal and family needs of union members.

"It has helped provide emergency assistance, through community resources, to union members in need as a result of disasters, strikes and layoffs. It has helped to develop better community relations through public service programs," the council's report said.

The report notes the continuing close relationship with the American Red Cross and the involvement of the department in programs on drug abuse and alcoholism, juvenile delinquency and youth crime and community health affairs.

UNION ECONOMISTS and research directors explore the problems that labor faces in dealing with Phase 2 of Pres. Nixon's new economic policy. Addressing the group at AFL-CIO headquarters is Frank Pollara, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Research. The union economists also attended sessions at the Bureau of Labor Statistics during the two-day meeting.

Direct Aid to Workers Marks U.S. Labor's International Effort

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Projects ranging from low-cost housing in Ghana to farmers' cooperatives in the Philippines are part of the AFL-CIO's continuing aid to the development of free trade unions throughout the world, the Executive Council reported to the convention.

Labor education projects, designed to help free trade unions in the emerging nations cope with such problems as national planning and collective bargaining, have been emphasized in the AFL-CIO's continued participation in the activities of labor institutes in Latin America, Africa and Asia.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) now has offices in 19 Latin American and Caribbean countries and has conducted programs which reach 20,000 workers annually, the council reported.

AIFLD projects have included the establishment of two centers for farm workers in northeastern Brazil, interest-free loans for Latin American trade unions, and the construction of 14,971 units of housing. AIFLD has emphasized technical assistance, with U.S. experts working in those countries, and providing university-trained economists for Latin American labor movements.

In Africa, 30 new projects have been started in the last two years, the council reported, bringing the total to 125 projects in 35 countries. These activities, under the direction of the African-American Labor Center (AALC), have included mobile health clinics, vocational training centers, housing construction, cooperative schools and a union accounting program. AALC has also purchased and shipped low-cost drugs and other medical supplies to Africa.

The Ghana Labor College, under a Ghanian staff trained in the United States, and a labor studies center at Haile Selassie University in Ethiopia are among the union education projects under way in Africa. Special educational programs are estimated to have reached another 10,000 African workers in the past two years.

For the first time, AALC conducted a Pan-African seminar on youth last year, and 27 labor leaders from 12 countries attended three-month union education programs in the United States.

Other AALC projects have included training in the development of co-ops in Dahomey; construction of 168 units of low-cost housing in Ghana; establishment of the Kenya Institute of Tailoring & Cutting, which has had 700 applications for its 125 openings; support of a union newspaper in Botswana, a nation which the council describes as surrounded by white racist countries, and programs to train printers in Nairobi and bus drivers in Nigeria.

The Asian-American Free Labor Institute (AAFLI) has opened a regional office in the Philippines to coordinate activities in Asia. In both South Vietnam and the Philippines, agricultural assistance such as tractors, fertilizer and irrigation systems has reflected the make-up of the work force in those nations.

Some 56 classes have trained 1,168 workers as part of the Philippines' Federation of Free Farmers' social development program in Central Luzon. Similar projects have been undertaken in Taiwan and Indonesia. The council said AAFLI has begun preliminary discussions with Japanese unions on the possibility of collaboration in assisting Asian trade unions.

The Executive Council also reported on "a number of serious developments causing great concern about the future course" of the International Labor Organization, the tripartite United Nations agency.

The ILO invoked a "double standard" in selecting assistant directors general from Communist and western nations, the council reported, and persisted in using Communist propaganda in ILO publications.

This led AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to testify before Congress that, "We have no desire to destroy or withdraw from the ILO, but if it continues in the trends it is going now, we have no further interest in it." The ILO office "has, within the last several months, taken steps to correct some shortcomings," the council noted, but "we cannot say with assurance what the future holds for the ILO."

In other international developments, the convention was told that the AFL-CIO had:

- Urged rejection of the Mansfield resolution for withdrawal of U.S. troops from western Europe because the assumption underlying it, "that the Soviet Union no longer harbors expansionist designs in Europe, (is) unrealistic and fallacious."
- Deplored the treaty between West Germany and Russia since it marked the first western recognition of Russian hegemony over Eastern Europe while the Russians gave no concessions in return.
- Cautioned against West Berlin becoming "an independent political entity" because such a move would be "the first step toward annexation of West Berlin by Moscow's puppet regime in East Germany."
- Announced opposition to United Nations membership for East Germany and urged the UN to carry out its 1951 resolution on examining the feasibility of free elections throughout all of Germany.
- Questioned UN membership for Red China, citing the Mao Tse-tung regime's "record of unceasing hostility to the aims, policies and principles of the United Nations."
- Urged continued U.S. support of Israel, which "needs the means to defend herself and prevent another war which might lead to a world conflagration."
- Expressed the American trade union movement's deep concern over North Vietnam's "continued violation of the 1949 Geneva Convention and denial of basic rights to American prisoners of war in Indochina."
- Sought relief for Polish workers suffering from chronic food shortages through an organization like the American Relief Administration in the 1921 Soviet famine.
- Urged the United States to initiate UN action to relieve Soviet persecution of Jews through compliance with the UN convention guaranteeing the right of anyone to leave any country, including his own.
- Protested Franco's persecution of Basques and urged the U.S. government "to bring to bear full diplomatic and economic pressure on the Spanish tyrannical regime to end its barbarism."

3 CWA Pacts Put into Effect By General Tel

Long efforts by the Communications Workers to get three companies of General Telephone & Electronics Corp. to implement new contracts have finally paid off.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne and Independent Telephone Director Rudy Mendoza said that the General companies in Ohio, California and the Southwest have now agreed to implement the contracts, all of which include retroactivity features.

"This will mean as much as $380 in back pay for some of our members in General of Ohio, whose contracts expired back in April," Mendoza said. The contract in California, on wages only, expired on July 14 and the expiration date in General of the Southwest was June 20.

The Office of Emergency Preparedness approved the wage increases on Sept. 28.

Nixon Policies Scored:

Job Slump Hinders Gains of Minorities

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The progress made by minority group members in the 1960s is now threatened by the nation's economic decline, the Executive Council said in its report to the convention.

Between 1963 and 1969, the median income of minorities increased from 53 percent of the white median to 63 percent, but that improvement has been arrested since 1969.

"The economic policies of the Nixon Administration, which have driven unemployment back up to levels which existed prior to 1963, threaten to reverse this movement of minority citizens," the report said. It cited Labor Dept. statistics on increased unemployment in urban poverty areas as one indicator.

The report credited the earlier progress to educational, manpower and anti-poverty programs for Negroes and other minority group members. But the Nixon Administration is dismantling and reducing those programs and substituting in their place "one gimmick after another," the report charged.

"Instead of the federal investment required to achieve the kind of expanding economy required for the future progress of minority group citizens, the nation is offered black capitalism, revenue sharing, the Philadelphia Plan and education voucher systems," the council noted.

Concurrently, the Nixon Administration has acted to stop minority group advancement by opposing cease and desist orders for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, urging the courts to slow down on desegregation of southern schools, announcing opposition to integration of the suburbs, trying to block effective voting rights legislation, and attempting Supreme Court appointments "to appeal to anti-civil rights sentiment North and South."

The success of 90 Apprenticeship Outreach programs, which have placed 10,680 minority group apprentices through June of 1971, is contrasted with the Administration's showcase, Philadelphia Plan, under which the Labor Dept. reports 41 minority group workers, "with no indication that any of the 41 came from sources other than existing union members or apprentices recruited by Outreach."

The report stresses that 95 percent of U.S. workers are hired directly by employers—not through union referral. This, plus the 10 percent unemployment rate in construction, "makes it clear the construction industry and the building trades have been made a scapegoat for the failures of the Administration to provide opportunities for minority group youth and workers," the report said.

Just as cooperation between the AFL-CIO and the minority community has brought success in apprenticeship, the report points out that through work with the EEOC, the number of cases naming unions as respondents was 1,347 in 1966 and only 1,849 in 1970, compared with an overall increase in EEOC complaints from 6,133 cases to 17,093 in the same period.

The report also points out that income from Spanish-surnamed Americans averages about $5,600 a year, even less than the $6,042 average for Negroes. And the average educational level, just over 12 years for all Americans, is 8.5 years for those with Spanish surnames.

Disputes Plan's Success Aided by Cooperation

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The internal disputes plan adopted by the 1961 AFL-CIO convention has proved highly successful over a decade of experience, the Executive Council reported.

It gave credit to the cooperation of affiliates and the competency of the mediators.

From its start on Jan. 1, 1962 through the first nine months of 1971, nearly 60 percent of the cases brought under Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution have been settled through mediation—665 out of 1,171.

Many cases, the council reported, were settled informally by the parties after discussions with aides to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

On a more formal basis, disputes are first referred to a panel of officers of AFL-CIO affiliates for mediation. Those still unresolved go to the impartial umpires for the program, David L. Cole and Howard W. Kleeb. All members of the Executive Council serve on the three-man subcommittee that hear appeals and examine complaints of non-compliance.

The umpires have issued 462 determinations during the program's history, of which 154 were appealed. Of the appeals, the council's subcommittees have denied 117, 18 were withdrawn, 14 were referred to the Executive Council and four are pending.

Since the 1967 convention report, the council noted, non-compliance sanctions required under the AFL-CIO Constitution have been removed from three affiliates.

It listed the following unions as presently in non-compliance with the determinations of the impartial umpire: the Air Line Pilots, National Maritime Union, Typographical Union, and Printing Pressmen.

2 Pittsburgh Units Select Teachers

Pittsburgh—A unit of nearly 700 paraprofessional school employes here and a group of instructors at the Allegheny County Community College have chosen the Teachers union as their bargaining agent.

The paraprofessionals voted 427-76 in favor of the Pittsburgh Federation of Teachers as bargaining agent. The option was no union at all and there were 30 challenged ballots.

Pres. Al Fondy of Teachers Local 400 said the union will seek a 12-month contract for the paraprofessionals that will expire at the same time as an agreement covering 3,750 Pittsburgh teachers.

The community college instructors on campuses at Northside, Monroeville and West Mifflin voted for the Teachers over the National Faculty Association, 140-26, with 12 ballots cast for no union.

The National Faculty Association is a community college affiliate of the National Education Association.

Council Report Cites Gains, Setbacks

Meany Stresses Commitment To Battle for Economic Justice

leading to the second phase of the Administration's policies.

Meany cited the record of Congress "faced with Administration opposition at every step" and listed the large number of problems which are still unresolved. On the international scene, he noted that "an uncertain future" awaits the nation in its current policies toward Red China, and that the fight for peace and freedom still remains unwon.

The federation president pointed out that labor was under attack "because the trade union movement refused to abandon the battle for economic justice and human dignity for all men and refuses, at the same time, to abdicate its leadership role to others. We do not intend to surrender to either group of critics," he wrote.

In his report, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said the net worth of the federation had increased $4,684,280 since the last convention, due to the per capita increase voted in 1969 and a constant supervision of expenses.

He reported also an increase of 172,000 in average per capita membership over 1969 despite two years of recession and high unemployment. The total reported membership of 13,177,000 is the highest since the formation of the AFL-CIO, with the exception of 1967.

The council report shows that seven AFL-CIO unions and two unaffiliated groups were involved in three mergers, including the five-union merge to create the American Postal Workers Union. Other mergers include the Steelworkers and the Stone Workers and the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers with the unaffiliated Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

On organizing, the council cited "two phenomenal, and not unrelated, factors" dominating organizing for the past two years—a dramatic increase in membership of public employe unions and "unprecedented escalation of organized resistance to union growth and collective bargaining by employers in the private sector."

In its detailed economic analysis for the convention, the council report recounted the history of Administration policies and said they added to inflation pressures and "depressed the economy." The 34-month record of "Administration game plans have plagued the American people with the worst combination of economic trends," the council said, adding that only decisive government action "can begin to turn the economy around rapidly toward full employment."

Examining collective bargaining results, the report stressed that rising living costs have "washed out" all or most of the buying power of workers' wages and fringe benefits gains during the past five years.

The council reiterated the need for tax reform, citing the federal system as rigged against wages and salaries and favoring unearned income. It restated also opposition to sharing federal funds with the states on a no-strings basis.

The report reviewed developments in social security, welfare reform, child care, unemployment compensation, workmen's compensation, national health insurance, Medicare and Medicaid and spelled out the framework for new and improved programs in these areas, with special attention on National Health Security.

The record of the Nixon Administration on education is characterized as "a succession of blows which threaten to destroy the progress so far achieved and to create a new crisis (in education)."

Administration attempts to weaken or delay enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1970 were also denounced in the report, and the council pledged a continuing program to watch over the implementation of the law to prevent its further weakening.

A detailed review of the problems of foreign trade and investment, with emphasis on the growth of multinational corporations, is set out by the council with a call for new policies to "meet today's international economic realities and the needs of the American people."

On international affairs, the council recounted the events of the past two years, noting the danger of a unilateral withdrawal of American forces from Europe, questioning the admission of Red China to the United Nations and the expulsion of the Republic of China, and restating strong opposition to oppression in Poland, the Soviet Union, Spain and elsewhere.

The report reviewed the relationships with the International Labor Organization, noting that "some progress has been made on the problems of principal concern to us and those who share with us the hope of fulfilling ILO objectives."

The role of the Human Resources Development Institute—the AFL-CIO's arm in the manpower field—the development of the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust, operation of anti-poverty programs and housing also are dealt with in detail in the report.

Turning to political activities, the council said the 1970 elections showed that labor's efforts overcame "both adverse arithmetic and the calculated use of emotional issues raised to obscure more basic ones," and that COPE was able to give more assistance to endorsed candidates than ever before.

The council warned that in 1972 "any repeat of the Democratic infighting of 1968 would sap the initial advantage Democrats now appear to have," based on Nixon's record and economic policies.

In a detailed examination of recent trends in court and administrative decisions, the council reported that one or two additional justices of a similar persuasion to Chief Justice Berger and Justice Blackmun "would present the union movement with a problem of the first magnitude."

On the National Labor Relations Board, the council said the performance of Chairman Miller "has not allayed the fear that his long-time representation of employers has inevitably influenced his point of view."

On civil rights, the council said the Nixon Administration has attempted to slow down the drive to end segregation and discrimination and that its economic policies had prevented minorities from access to the "mainstream of American society."

It cited successful union efforts to increase the number of minority group members in skilled jobs through Apprenticeship Outreach programs and their extension to qualified non-union journeymen.

It called specifically on AFL-CIO unions to support the A. Philip Randolph Institute and its voter registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns.

In its detailed review of national legislation, the council took the Administration to task for ill-conceived programs, delaying tactics and its refusal to spend appropriated funds. It hit out also at the President's "insistent and careless use of the veto."

The report also included a summary of state legislative activities and reports of AFL-CIO headquarters departments and the trade and industrial departments.

Modest Progress Seen In State Law Changes

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor scored mixed gains in state legislatures over the last two years, the Executive Council reported, finding that on balance modest progress towards labor's legislative goals was achieved in a number of states.

The report cited growing emphasis on the need for state laws assuring full collective bargaining rights for state and local government employes.

It noted that a special Executive Council committee, after reviewing comprehensive public employe labor-management legislation enacted by a few states, drafted a model bill in the fall of 1970 which was approved by the council and distributed to state central bodies.

The council reported that legislatures had made few changes in state laws affecting bargaining rights of workers in the private sector.

Activities of "right-to-work" proponents have diminished considerably in the last two years, the council said.

But in the absence of campaigns to enact conventional open shop laws, the report warned, the National Right to Work Committee has shifted its emphasis to legal action against union security provisions, punitive national legislation and opposition to measures that would guarantee bargaining rights of public employes and farm workers.

With nearly every state now having some sort of minimum wage law, the council said efforts in this area have concentrated on raising the wage floors and extending coverage to agricultural and domestic workers.

The report also noted that legislatures in 22 states took action in 1969-70 to safeguard greater portions of workers' earnings from garnishment. In most instances, the states patterned their changes after federal provisions.

In the area of women's rights, the council stressed that attempts to insure equal treatment on the job should not at the same time weaken existing legal protections for women.

The report noted that Monday holiday laws similar to the new federal laws have been enacted in 45 states.

Nixon's Design for NLRB Courts Viewed as New Danger to Workers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A new element of labor concern emerges from a section of the Executive Council report dealing with the National Labor Relations Board and the courts.

Past AFL-CIO conventions have criticized the weaknesses of the nation's basic labor law in effectively protecting collective bargaining rights against an employer determined to use every delaying tactic available to break or weaken unions.

This year's council report reiterates this concern, citing the notorious record of the J. P. Stevens & Co. as an example.

Labor board and court proceedings "have proven too slow and the remedies ordered too weak to check the company's flagrant lawlessness or protect the rights of the workers to join unions and bargain collectively," the council notes.

But its report to the AFL-CIO's ninth convention stresses a new and dangerous aspect of the problem—the strong possibility that the NLRB will be transformed by Pres. Nixon's appointments into a pro-employer agency, perhaps even more so than during the last Republican Administration.

Coupled with that is the similar transformation of the courts which pass final judgment on the NLRB decisions through the review and appeals procedures.

Starting at the top, the council report notes that it is "quite plain" that the justices Nixon has appointed to the Supreme Court "are fundamentally unsympathetic to the views of organized labor, at least in regard to labor-management disputes."

Already, the Executive Council warns, the "highly-conservative" Nixon appointments to the NLRB and the lower federal courts have had an impact.

The report notes that the AFL-CIO protested the appointment of Edward B. Miller as chairman of the NLRB because of his record as attorney for employers in labor relations matters.

No union attorney had ever been appointed to the board by a Democratic president, nor should any be appointed, the council said.

"Unfortunately," it added, "Miller's service on the board has not allayed the fear that his long-time representation of employers has inevitably influenced his views."

The council took note of a study made at the University of California Law School showing that Miller took the employer position in 70 of 73 cases in which the NLRB was divided during his first 11 months on the board.

And the Executive Council comes to this grim conclusion:

"There can be little doubt that such puny protections as the NLRB has provided for workers and unions are destined for further shriveling as soon as the Nixon appointees to the board comprise a majority."

Hospital Worker Bargaining Urged

Many of the hospital strikes of recent years would never have taken place if the workers had collective bargaining rights protected by federal law, Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) said.

Thompson is the sponsor of a bill to extend the coverage of the National Labor Relations Act to employes of non-profit hospitals and chairman of a House Labor subcommittee holding hearings on the legislation.

Many of the nations lowest-paid workers are among the 3 million hospital employes, Thompson noted.

"In those few states which cover hospital employes under state labor laws," said Thompson, strikes are rare but wages and working conditions are substantially better.

Meany Warns of Threats to Freedoms

Charges Nixon Seeks to Make 'Scapegoat' of Labor Movement

bly, there will be no explanation and no apology if Phase 2 happens to fail.

"Harsher measures will be promulgated against the nation's workers and their unions, and we can expect anti-strike edicts and injunctions and all the other harassments that have been the lot of labor in the authoritarian countries in recent history."

Meany said it was "ironic and interesting to note the new affinity of Mr. Nixon for totalitarian regimes from Peking to Moscow to Athens."

It is ironic, too, he said, that in this instance big business "is applauding and promoting the President's crackdown on labor." He urged business to heed the lesson of history that political domination of the means of production has inevitably included business as well as labor.

"The authoritarian mind in government trusts neither the people nor the free and voluntary institutions of the people," the AFL-CIO president declared.

"The impulse is to control, to direct and to dictate. The only barrier to that impulse, and the only bulwarks of freedom, are our constitutional Bill of Rights, the existence of an effective opposition, free private institutions and the free spirit of the American people.

"Faced with these impediments, the inevitable tendency of power in such hands is to move to defame and to destroy them.

"In defending the rights and the freedom of working people as they are constituted to do, the trade unions of America can expect to be objects of such attention and the targets of this type of power, all the more so if labor is to stand in the struggle."

Meany informed the delegates that Pres. Nixon would address them at 10:30 a.m., Friday, Nov. 19.

Earlier, Meany reviewed in detail Nixon's actions and other developments that led to the naming of the Pay Board and labor's agreement to serve on it provided it was set up as a tripartite body, representing labor, management and the public, and that its standards and rulings not be subject to veto.

But, he stressed, the public members were supposed to be neutral and under no circumstances were they to represent the government.

"Well," Meany said, "the Judge (Pay Board Chairman George Boldt) is on the federal payroll, and he is certainly neutral in the sense that he doesn't know a damn thing about labor and management."

Running the roster of the "public" members, the AFL-CIO president described Arnold Weber as "the hatchetman" who had been on the Administration's payroll until the very day before he was named to the Pay Board.

He called William C. Caples "a nice man" who had spent his entire career on management's side of the bargaining table until two years ago when he became president of Kenyon College. Meany noted that Caples is a former vice president of the National Association of Manufacturers.

He noted that Kermit Gordon, now head of the Brookings Institution, was at one time director of the government's Bureau of the Budget.

Dr. Neil H. Jacoby, Meany said, is a conservative economist who, as a member of the Council of Economic Advisers under Arthur Burns, "helped fashion those two recessions" during the Eisenhower Administration.

"So there are the public members of your Pay Board. And. of course, it adds up to a stacked deck. It adds up to playing with loaded dice, just as simple as that. There is no hope, or very little hope, for equity."

The AFL-CIO president went on to chronicle for the delegates what he called "four days of complete frustration . . . a debasing experience" during the early stages of the Pay Board.

The delays, postponements of meetings, refusals to face the issues and vote on them during that period, he said, gave him the impression "that they were trying to goad us into walking out."

But, he said, we informed them that no matter how long they delayed it, we were going to be there."

Eventually, he reported, the votes were taken with labor's proposals and those of industry rejected and the public members' guidelines—practically identical with industry's—adopted.

When the labor members sought clarification from Weber as to the meaning of key points, he told them that the major contracts such as those on the railroads, the West Coast docks, in aerospace and in trucking, would all "be taken care of."

"Finally, I said, hell, what about the little guys? You are taking care of all the big guys."

Meany said that there was "a deliberate attempt here to divide the labor movement" through private visits of individual public members to individual labor members.

"I can tell you, about dividing the movement, that I personally spared no effort from the very start of this whole maneuver to try to see to it that labor stayed together.

"I brought in the Auto Workers, the Teamsters, and I want to say they worked with us. They didn't buy this idea they were going to be taken care of. In fact, they stated very, very simply that they didn't care who was taken care of: Unless everybody was taken care of, there was no deal."

Meany earlier had reviewed labor's opposition to other elements of the new Nixon game plan, particularly the proposal for a $3 billion investment tax credit for business.

"Make no mistake about it, this is this man's innate philosophy. Whatever philosophy he has is based on the idea that if you make the fat cats a little fatter, somewhere along the line the poor simpletons are going to profit by it.

"His slogan is 'profits, profits, profits.' "

LABOR'S OPPOSITION to the Supreme Court nomination of William H. Rehnquist is voiced by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Legislative Rep. Kenneth Meiklejohn is at right.

Pay Board Service Tied To Justice for Workers

Treas. Patrick E. Gorman that he had hoped for a stronger statement, Meany told the delegates that AFL-CIO representatives will stay on the board "only so long as we have some hope" of helping the low paid workers. He added:

"We will decide when that hope is gone. However, we also say that until we achieve these objectives, we will not cooperate. . . . Now, if the President of the United States does not want our continued membership on those terms, he knows what he can do."

He continued: "When we think there is no longer hope, we will call a meeting of the Executive Council and we will get off. If the President doesn't like the terms we lay down here, let him kick us off. It's just as simple as that."

A thunderous roar of "ayes" rolled over the hall when the vote was called for, there were no "nays."

The council statement that won strong approval from the convention said that the "wage control mechanism" established by the President "is being used as a device to destroy the American concept of free collective bargaining."

It charged that the commitment for an independent, tripartite board with public members to be "citizens of high repute, knowledgeability and neutrality . . . has not been kept."

One of the Pay Board's first acts was to nullify thousands "of legal contracts covering millions of workers," the statement declared, adding that "we flatly reject the concept that anyone—be it Pay Board or President—has the power to abrogate any legal collective bargaining agreement or any other contract voluntarily and legally entered into by American citizens."

As the convention was in session, the Senate Banking Committee voted to amend the Administration's economic stabilization bill to require retroactive payment of wage increases denied workers during the 90-day freeze, except where the amount is found "unreasonably inconsistent" with pay guidelines. Earlier the House Banking Committee approved a similar amendment.

Declaring further that "there is little hope that economic justice can be achieved by this board, the majority of whom are guided by the dictates of the Administration or the interests of big business," the council recommended:

"1. That our representatives remain on the Pay Board only so long as a reasonable hope exists of securing recognition of the validity of contracts and of achieving justice for working people generally—including, most particularly, those with low- or sub-standard incomes and those without the protection of strong bargaining representatives.

"Until those objectives are assured, labor cannot associate itself with the actions of the Board or encourage cooperation with their administration or enforcement.

"2. That the unions of the AFL-CIO insist at every level on the validity of their contracts in all their terms and in all their particulars, and that they take every lawful action at their command to insure that their contracts are honored.

"3. That the AFL-CIO continue the legislative effort in the Congress to protect the validity of contracts."

Campaign Funding Bill Backed in Senate Test

The Senate moved towards passage of a nonpartisan method of financing presidential campaigns that would end the dependence of candidates and parties on big contributors.

A 49-46 test vote pointed to adoption of a plan allowing each taxpayer voluntarily to earmark $1 of his income tax payment for a special fund to be used only in presidential campaigns.

Major party candidates would be entitled to tap the fund for 15 cents for each person of voting age; minor party candidates would receive an allotment based on their party's share of the vote in the previous presidential campaign.

The fund would be available only to candidates who agreed not to solicit or accept contributions from other sources.

A somewhat similar provision was enacted by Congress in 1966 but was repealed the following year without ever having been tested.

The Senate bill, sponsored by Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.), also would provide a tax-saving inducement for individuals to contribute to the candidate or party of their choice in federal, state and local elections or primaries.

For each $2 contributed, an individual could deduct $1 from his tax bill up to a maximum of $25.

As an alternative, he could claim up to $100 in contributions as a deduction from his taxable income. This alternate method would be an advantage only for high-income persons who are in a top tax bracket.

Republicans, who traditionally receive the lion's share of contributions from wealthy businessmen and have no trouble raising campaign funds, strongly oppose the measure. That's one reason the sponsors are seeking to add it as an amendment to the Administration tax bill. They hope that way to make it veto proof, by putting Pres. Nixon in the position where he couldn't veto the bill without at the same time killing his own tax program.

The test vote in the Senate came on a Republican motion to separate the campaign funding proposal from the tax bill.

It was beaten, 49-46, with only three Democrats crossing party lines to vote with the solid bloc of Republicans.

Meanwhile, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, the House was nearing a vote on a different—but not contradictory—method of regulating campaign financing.

On the floor was an assortment of bills and amendments taking various approaches to limiting the amount of money candidates for federal office could spend for radio and television broadcasts and other forms of advertising.

The Senate has already passed a spending limit bill.

Farm Group Urges Senate To Reject Butz

Denver—A leading farm organization broke its tradition of neutrality to presidential Cabinet appointments to urge the Senate to reject the nomination of Dr. Earl L. Butz as Secretary of Agriculture.

The national board of the Farmers Union said confirmation of Butz would be bad news for the family farmer.

"He has been in the active service of a number of corporations which seek to dominate the rural economy," the board statement noted.

As a former assistant secretary in the Eisenhower Administration under Ezra Taft Benson, the Farmers Union said, Butz helped shape policies that forced millions of families to abandon their farms.

Senate hearings on the nomination are currently under way.

Nixon's '72 Defeat Emerges As Top Convention Theme

LABOR'S UNITY in the face of Nixon Administration attacks was stressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the federation's ninth convention. Meany warned that Nixon is seeking to make unions the "scapegoat" for the failures of his economic policies.

Ovation Backs AFL-CIO Leader:

Meany Exposes Nixon's Ploy To Pin 'Unfair' Tag on Labor

By Tom Castor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Pres. Nixon came to the AFL-CIO convention "to contrive a situation under which he could claim that he had been unfairly treated," Federation Pres. George Meany charged.

Meany was given a standing ovation of several minutes duration by delegates as he responded to Administration criticism that the President had been treated discourteously by the convention.

Some newspapers in the nation obliged the White House with large headlines describing the delegates as a mass of "jeering labor bosses." Representatives of two of the major television networks reported complaints from the White House on coverage which the Administration apparently was dissatisfied with.

Meany made it "perfectly clear" that organized labor did not intend to be cowed or intimidated by the political gambit, which was complete with a White House photographer who appeared to photograph the President shaking hands with delegates on the convention floor.

"We respect the man that holds the office, and we are going to continue to do that," Meany said. "However, this doesn't mean that we have got to be subservient to the man" and it doesn't mean that "our respect for the President and his office calls for us to submit to something that we consider unjust."

"Otherwise, our pride in America and its institutions would be meaningless."

The President's speech was pure political propaganda, Meany said, "and I have no objection to that because we hear a lot of that, and he certainly should not be barred from making a political speech."

But he added, "I have the impression the President did not come here to make a speech. He came here to contrive a situation under which he could claim that he had been unfairly treated."

While Nixon maintained a tough posture on his economic policies as he spoke to the convention, Meany noted that the President had not even mentioned the major issue disturbing the trade unions of America:

"Do we have the right to sign a contract with our employers and see that contract observed, or have we lost that right?

"I don't think we have," Meany emphasized, "and we are not going to stop fighting for it."

The delegates gave Nixon modest applause as he approached the speaker's platform and interrupted his address with applause at least eight times.

Although the President brought a prepared text to the convention, he threw it away in order, he said, to "talk straight from the shoulder."

"And that corny act is as old as the Republic," Meany observed.

There was no booing or jeering, but there was laughter from the floor when Nixon told delegates that

Vote Fund Plan Wins Over Bitter GOP Bloc

By David L. Perlman

A labor-supported plan to free presidential candidates from dependence on wealthy contributors won Senate approval on a key 52-47 vote.

It went to a House-Senate conference committee as part of a revenue package that includes most of Pres. Nixon's proposals for giveaway tax reductions for business. And the combination of the two had the White House in a tizzy.

Republican leaders bitterly oppose the political contribution tax allocation that could wipe out the GOP's traditional money advantage over Democratic candidates.

Senate Republican Leader Hugh Scott served notice that he would

Delegates Endorse Federation Policy

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO tooled up for a year of intensive political action to turn out the Nixon Administration and its threats to trade union freedom and the nation's economic security.

The political theme and the 1972 elections dominated the federation's three-day ninth convention as the nearly 900 delegates gave a clear and loud mandate to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to carry on his effective and vigorous defense of labor's position on the Pay Board and supported his sharply etched expose of the Administration's maneuvers to cast unions in a poor light.

The delegates gave full evidence of a strong and unified labor movement as they spelled out in 78 resolutions the deep concern of the trade union movement with all facets of American life and cheered the unanimous re-election of Meany, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and 33 members of the Executive Council.

And they cheered even louder when Meany, defending the convention and the delegates from charges that they had treated Pres. Nixon discourteously, termed Nixon's speech "pure political propaganda" and said that "he came here to contrive a situation under which he could claim he had been unfairly treated." (Story this page.)

The issue was drawn sharply early in the convention when, after listening to a scathing indictment by Meany of the Administration's past economic failures and his warning of efforts to make labor the "scapegoat" if Phase 2 fails, the delegates unanimously voted for a special Executive Council resolution that AFL-CIO representatives would stay on the Pay Board only as long as there is reasonable hope of securing justice for working people.

The President's speech the following day challenging labor's position on economic policy was answered by quick and unanimous adoption of resolutions highly critical of Administration policies, reaffirming AFL-CIO positions and urging new programs in a wide range of areas.

The President was challenged sharply also by four announced or presumed candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination who told the convention of the overriding need for a new Administration to handle the nation's critical problems. The messages came from four senators—Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Henry Jackson (D-Wash.), Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), George McGovern (D-S.D.).

The delegates heard also from Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., executive director-designate of the National Urban League, in an address noting the close links between the trade union and civil rights movements and the necessity for close and continued cooperation.

They heard also from leaders of the State of Israel, from spokesmen from the Caribbean and Ireland, from fraternal delegates from Great Britain and Canada on the problems of those lands and the Full Employment Tops Economic Objectives

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Nixon Administration should re-establish full employment at a decent wage as the "top-priority objective of national economic policy" instead of redistributing the nation's wealth to big business and the rich, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

It spelled out a 10-point program to revitalize the American economy, putting the principal emphasis on the job crisis and the responsibility for alleviating that crisis squarely on the shoulders of the federal government.

The convention called for a federal fiscal policy that would "encourage sufficient job-creating economic expansion."

In closing the convention, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reaffirmed his belief that Pres. Nixon "has nothing in his experience to indicate that he has the ability or intelligence or knowledge to control the economy of this country."

"When you control the economy of this country, you are controlling the lives of over 200 million people, and there is nothing in his track record to indicate that he is qualified to do that," Meany said.

"So as we leave here today, let us leave with determination to carry on this fight and with the knowledge that the one thing we can't do, we cannot submit to an injustice, and under no circumstances can we submit to threats."

The convention noted that 34 months of Administration game plans "have plagued the American people with the worst combination of economic trends—high unemployment, idle plants and machines, rapid inflation and declining public confidence."

And with the economy operating at more than $75 million below its

COMEDIAN JERRY LEWIS, honored at the convention with the AFL-CIO's Murray-Green Award for his humanitarian contributions to America, gets in his own bit of political gamesmanship to bring a chuckle as well as congratulations from Federation Pres. George Meany.

Award, Cheers, Laughs Given to Jerry Lewis

Bal Harbour, Fla.—It was one of those warm interludes that make a convention memorable—rich in sentiment and lightened by the quips of Jerry Lewis.

Jerry is "America's number one funny man," AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge said. And, indeed, Lewis demonstrated this anew when he got his turn at the microphone.

But that's not why he was being presented the AFL-CIO's annual Murray-Green Award, which perpetuates the memory of the presidents of the former AFL and CIO—Philip Murray and William Green—while honoring the recipient for notable contributions to the nation's welfare.

Suffridge, in his role as chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee, told the convention why Jerry Lewis was chosen.

Jerry's humor emphasizes love and humanity, Suffridge said. "He builds understanding and compassion and brotherhood . . . to make this a stronger and better nation."

He is also "a dedicated trade unionist." In fact, Suffridge quipped, "Jerry pays dues to so many unions that if he were to suddenly retire, trade union membership would decline drastically."

And then Suffridge spoke of Lewis's dedication to the Muscular Dystrophy Association and the fund-raising Labor Day telethon he conducts "that would drain all the energy and strength of a normal man."

Welcoming Lewis into the company of such previous award winners as Harry Truman, Dr. Jonas Salk and Eleanor Roosevelt, Suffridge told him that he has warmed America's heart and "done more than one man's share to make it greater."

And as he presented the award and an accompanying $5,000 check to Jerry Lewis, the convention delegates, guests and visitors rose for a massive, prolonged demonstration—a spontaneous outpouring of warmth and appreciation.

In a minute, of course, they were laughing.

"Let me make myself perfectly clear," Jerry said in a parody of Pres. Nixon. "I am not happy being the second comedian to address this body. I must presume I am Act Three."

He expressed regret that he hadn't been around "to see the joy and excitement on Mr. Meany's face" during Pres. Nixon's address to the convention.

And he suggested that if the President has trouble making things clear, he might take a tip from an earlier president, Calvin Coolidge, who observed that "when people are out of work, unemployment develops."

There were other lines that set the delegates chuckling, and then he put aside his comedian's hat and became very serious.

Of the muscular dystrophy research his fund-raising finances, he said: "We have never been closer to finding the cause and the cure for this dread disease."

He spoke of the early door-to-door fund-raising sponsored by the Postal Workers and the Fire Fighters and how the entire labor movement then pitched in to support the program.

"I am receiving an award that really belongs to the 14 million AFL-CIO members," Jerry Lewis concluded, "and I thank you from the bottom of my heart for letting me keep it."

And again the delegates cheered.

Scholarships Urged For Studies Center

Bal Harbour, Fla.—All AFL-CIO affiliates were urged to make "full and continuing use" of the Labor Studies Center, including the establishment of scholarship programs "to facilitate the broadest possible participation in the center's program."

The Labor Studies Center, now in its third year, in addition to convention action urging the scholarships, was singled out by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as an institution "financed completely by the AFL-CIO" that enables affiliates to train staff people and their "promising young men and women" in the fundamentals of trade unionism.

Meany noted the center will be moving into its new home in the Washington area shortly after the first of the year. A display explaining the center's functions and operations was set up at the entrance to the convention hall.

At Every Level of Government:

Expanded Aid to Education Sought to Avert New Crisis

By Rex Hardesty

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO convention issued a strong appeal for the revival of U.S. education through full funding from every level of government.

The convention resolution was based on an Executive Council report spelling out the dangers to America's school system and charging the Nixon Administration with "speaking with two voices" about education.

"Since 1969, Pres. Nixon's Administration has dealt the public schools a succession of blows which threaten the progress achieved so far and create a new crisis," the report said.

It cited appropriations requests of as little as 45 percent of previous levels, virtual abandonment of vocational education and "bizarre" experiments with educational vouchers under which "public schools, already beleaguered by inadequate funds, would face new uncertainty and chaos."

To correct these mistakes, the convention urged that education—from pre-kindergarten through college and with provision for adult and vocational courses—"be given high funding priorities, especially at the state and federal levels."

The resolution called for expansion of programs to aid education to bring federal support "up to the level of one-third of the nation's total educational expenditure."

In a separate resolution, the convention endorsed the National Partnership in Education Act and urged decisive improvement in the 6 percent of gross national product which the United States currently spends on education.

The resolution noted that "major public school systems such as Chicago, Philadelphia, Gary, Detroit and Dayton and many others are closing or are in danger of closing their schools for weeks and months because of exhaustion of local and state tax revenues."

This stems from reliance on local property taxes as the base for funding education when increasing mobility from district to district should dictate a larger federal role, the resolution said. It urged better balance between the $2,100 spent per college student and the $700 per elementary and secondary student that the federal government is now spending. That balance would be provided by enactment of the National Partnership in Education Act, the convention noted.

Other resolutions called for establishment of courses about the labor movement at the secondary school level and a national policy on vocational education "to redirect education in the 1970s to prepare every person leaving school at the completion of grade 12 for immediate employment."

The convention condemned the Nixon education record for scuttling of college construction, cutting back on college student aid, failing to match words about the emphasis on career education with adequate funds, encouraging recalcitrant school boards to maintain the status quo instead of moving on desegregation, talking about the great promise of early childhood education while cutting back on Headstart, and emphasizing "educational research" while freezing funds.

The convention said the danger of performance contracts was from "educational hucksters who promise guaranteed results" which they can't produce.

Voucher plans, under which parents can go shopping among private and public schools, "could very possibly bring about the total collapse of the public schools, leaving behind nothing but a jumble of competing private enterprise schools," the convention said.

The Administration's "block grant" proposals ignore the fact that "local needs in education are not always identical with local political power," it was noted. Block grants could wipe out the years of work that have gone into fitting congressional projects to the disadvantaged, the handicapped or any others ignored on the local scene, it was stressed.

Job Safety 'Frustrated' By Weak Enforcement

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The goal of a safe and healthy workplace will be "needlessly delayed and frustrated," the AFL-CIO convention warned, unless the Nixon Administration's performance in carrying out the Occupational Safety & Health Act is "drastically improved."

Strengthening amendments to the law are needed, the convention resolution declared, but many of the problems arise out of the administration of the act.

The resolution charged that discretionary powers given to the Secretary of Labor are being used "to delay implementation of standards, soften the impact of enforcement on employers, weaken the act's provisions setting forth the rights and protections for workers, and moving with unseemly haste to abandon federal responsibilities to the various state governments."

It found delay, also, on the part of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare in carrying out its occupational health responsibilities. And it found "little, if any" evidence of coordination between the two departments in areas of mutual responsibility.

The convention urged congressional committees to hold oversight hearings on administration of the law.

It spelled out a number of specific areas where the law should be amended, including strict requirements that state plans must meet. It proposed a one-year test period for a state plan to demonstrate in practice that it is the equal of the federal program before the Labor Dept. delegates its responsibility.

The resolution charged that "the inadequate budget requests of the Nixon Administration" have been a major cause of the "less than vigorous" implementation of the law.

If the next budget request "calls for the same diet," the convention said, "Congress should substantially increase appropriations, particularly in the fields of enforcement, standards, training and research."

The resolution also urged expanded programs to train union safety committeemen, and it concluded:

"Our responsibilities are clear—to watch over the federal government's program so that it is not watered down, to seek strengthening amendments to the act, and to do our share at every work site to make sure that no longer will any worker be forced to jeopardize his life or his health."

Labor Tools Up for Nixon's '72 Ouster

Convention Affirms Support for Meany

role of the American unions in international labor affairs.

Meany put the work of the convention in perspective in his concluding remarks, noting that the record will "show the tremendous interest of this movement in improving the quality of American life and in improving the effectiveness of the trade union movement."

The highlight of the deliberations, he pointed out, was "the question of basic trade union freedom. This is really what we have been talking about. . . . This is the thing we are trying to preserve, because everything else we do depends on the maintenance of trade union freedom."

And as to the year ahead, Meany pointed the direction:

"I repeat what I said the other day, and I say this advisedly, and there is nothing disrespectful about it, it is just a question of fact; Pres. Nixon has nothing in his experience to indicate that he has the ability or intelligence or knowledge to control the economy of this country . . . there is nothing in his track record to indicate that he is qualified to do so.

"So as we leave here today, let us leave with determination to carry on this fight and with the knowledge that the one thing we can't do, we cannot submit to injustice, and under no circumstances can we submit to threats."

To carry on the fight the delegates enacted a series of resolutions designed to promote a program of full employment, a thorough and deep cleaning up of pollution, an international affairs policy to bring peace and freedom and keep America in the forefront of democratic leadership.

They voted for a carefully documented program to prevent the continuing export of American jobs, to bring a measure of control over the multinational corporations and bring trade policy into the realities of the world of the 1970s.

Extension of educational opportunities to all Americans at all economic levels, the continuing fight for civil rights and civil liberties, a program of national health insurance, collective bargaining justice for public workers, a no-fare system for public transit, a proposal for controls on handguns, a basic program of tax reform and financing for state and local governments all emerged from the convention.

This issue of the AFL-CIO News deals in detail with the convention's actions, the speakers and the other events of the historic three-day meeting.

Meany Resting Satisfactorily In Hospital

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was resting comfortably at George Washington University Hospital in Washington after being admitted Nov. 25 for treatment of chest pains.

As this issue of the News went to press Meany was in satisfactory condition in the hospital's coronary intensive care unit where he will be kept for at least 72 hours for precautionary care and tests.

A preliminary diagnosis indicated a possible spasm of the coronary artery but tests so far have showed all basic heart functions normal.

Meany was taken to the hospital at 3:30 a.m., Nov. 25, from his Bethesda home by ambulance after he was awakened by chest pains. He had returned home earlier that day from the AFL-CIO convention in Bal Harbour, Fla.

His illness caused cancellation of his scheduled appearance Nov. 28 on Face the Nation, a CBS interview program.

PRES. NIXON turns to George Meany to make a point during his address to the AFL-CIO convention. Meany later suggested that the point of Nixon's visit was "to contrive a situation under which he could claim that he had been unfairly treated." Despite their strong disagreement with his policies, delegates listened to the President with respectful attention and occasional applause.

Newark School Battle Draws Strong Support

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO convention declared its continuing support for the six-year struggle to organize Newark, N.J., teachers and called on the New Jersey governor to grant clemency to more than 250 teachers who were given jail sentences and fines totaling $100,000 as the result of two strikes.

"Two exhausting strikes against vicious political forces" were necessary, the convention noted—one to win a first contract and another to preserve rights and benefits previously negotiated.

The strikes came after three election campaigns against the National Education Association which resulted in the Teachers winning bargaining rights.

The entire dues-checkoff proceeds of Teachers Local 481 have been appropriated by a court to apply to a $270,000 fine against the union, and the AFT has spent more than a third of a million dollars in support of Newark teachers.

Legal expenses have totaled more than $100,000, delegates noted, and the U.S. Supreme Court has refused to review the issues involved.

The convention called Newark "the bitterest battleground for teacher unionism in the history of the labor movement."

Nixon Gambit Bared Down to Last Flourish

his 90-day freeze on prices had been effective, "and if you don't think so, go home and ask your wives who go to the grocery stores."

At this point, delegates spontaneously began laughing, and Meany conceded that "this laughter was of a type that indicated disagreement with the President, and I think the ladies laughed the loudest."

However, he said, "we certainly still have a Constitution and a Bill of Rights, and I don't know that they can take away our rights unless they actually put it in the Constitution.

"In other words, I still think we have a constitutional right to laugh."

Nixon's address represented a defense of his economic policies—and foreign policies—the day after the convention had decided unanimously that AFL-CIO representatives would remain on the Pay Board only so long as there is hope of attaining justice for working people.

Nixon quoted Meany's remarks of the previous day in which the federation president said organized labor would continue to insist that contracts be honored and that "if the President of the United States doesn't want our membership on the Pay Board on our terms, he knows what he can do."

In a firm voice, Nixon told the convention, "Well, you know, Pres. Meany is correct. I know exactly what I can do, and I'm going to do it, and I think it is time that we all understand just where we stand on this. . . ."

Nixon never did say exactly what he was going to do, except to declare that he wanted labor's participation, but whether or not he gets it, "it is my obligation as President of the United States to make this program of stopping the rise in the cost of living succeed, and to the extent that my powers allow it, I shall do exactly that."

After the speech, Nixon departed from the routine set by Secret Service men the previous evening—a routine agreed to in minute detail by the AFL-CIO, Meany said.

As if on cue, Secret Service men dropped a rope barrier marking out the President's scheduled route of departure from the floor.

Nixon then waded into the crowd and began shaking hands, deserting the escort committee provided by the federation.

When the delegates began to surge toward the President and his entourage, Meany asked them to "kindly take their seats." After Nixon had left the hall, Meany commented: "We will now proceed with Act II."

This drew a standing, cheering ovation from the delegates, which they did not accord to Nixon.

Meany noted that the White House had complete cooperation with security requests, even though the President had decided at the last minute to visit the convention.

Meany emphasized that a White House request for live television was denied because it would have displaced about 90 delegates from their seats.

And a request that a band play "Ruffles and Flourishes" was rejected because the convention had no band, "only chamber music" and as Meany noted, I don't think you can play 'Ruffles and Flourishes' on a violin. I could be wrong, but this is my impression"

Meany also answered criticism that he was discourteous to the President because he had provided a chair for him in the second row on the speaker's platform.

The answer to that, Meany said, is that it was the same chair in the same position "where all of our distinguished visitors sit in the brief moments before their introduction."

"John F. Kennedy sat in that chair. Lyndon Johnson sat in that chair."

Broad New Protections Sought to Aid Consumer

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO convention called for a broad program of consumer legislation to protect the interests of workers and their families when they buy products for their homes and personal use.

Delegates urged passage of a new comprehensive Product Safety Act on household appliances to safeguard individuals from harm or injury.

The convention also called for improvement of existing legislation on specific consumer products such as "automobiles, fabrics, drugs, cosmetics, medical devices and household chemicals.

"We again stress the need for a wholesome Fish & Fishery Products Act with strict inspection requirements."

The convention supported legislation and administrative actions to eliminate excessive and unfair finance and insurance charges for consumer credit and "to limit or abolish abusive creditor techniques for collection of debts."

The resolution also urged:

- Federal enactment of auto insurance reform, incorporating the "no-fault" principle of compensation.
- Legislation to remedy the problem of meaningless and ineffective warranties on consumer products and to induce manufacturers to honor their warranties in full.
- Laws to compel informative labeling for consumer products, including "ingredients, nutritional values, expiration dates and durability," pricing in terms of price per unit of quantity plus more extensive use of government grading programs.
- Enlarged powers for such agencies as the Federal Trade Commission to act on behalf of consumers both in the prevention and redress of fraud, deception and unfair practices.
- Consumer class action legislation to enable cheated consumers to sue as a group.
- Prompt action on legislation to establish a federal Consumer Protection Agency.

Convention Lists 891 Delegates

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The decisions at the ninth AFL-CIO convention were made by 891 delegates representing 113 national and international unions, six departments, 50 state bodies and 175 central bodies.

The Credentials Committee reported that over 415 representatives of the general and labor press, radio and television were accredited to cover the convention.

There were 101 foreign trade union representatives and visitors from 55 countries registered and lining all sides of the convention hall during the key speeches were hundreds of guests.

Support Urged for Randolph Institute

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The "moral and financial" support of all affiliated unions for the A. Philip Randolph Institute was urged by the AFL-CIO convention.

The convention praised Randolph, an AFL-CIO vice president, as "a pioneer crusader" in equal rights and "one of America's most influential and persuasive spokesmen for racial justice" despite the relatively small size of his union, the Sleeping Car Porters.

The institute named after him consistently promotes the economic betterment of all workers, the convention said.

JOSEPH ALMOGI

YITZHAK BEN-AHARON

Israel Rejects Attempts At Unjust Settlement

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"The working men and women of Israel are not going to accept loaded dice" in negotiations to ease the Middle East crisis, the AFL-CIO convention was told.

Yitzhak Ben-Aharon, the secretary general of Histadrut, the Israeli federation of labor, reported that "the stormy, dynamic growth of our economy and society under a state of siege has brought with it some shadows and some heartbreaking failures."

He vowed that Israel would not allow "the pre-conceived ideas of arbitrators" to dictate terms and said that genuine peace would come only when the Arab states "sit down around a negotiating table with us."

Ben-Aharon and Joseph Almogi, Israel's minister of Labor who also addressed the convention, expressed apprehension over U.S. hesitation to give full support to Israel.

"If the ceasefire has continued for 1½ years, it is because the balance of forces in our area made war too risky" for the Arab nations, Almogi said in appealing to the United States to help maintain the balance of power. "The very hesitation to supply the Phantom aircraft encourages the other side in its inflexibility."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who praised Histadrut as "the trade union movement that built a nation," said Israel's request for aid was unique because for once, "we are dealing with a nation that wants our help and is willing to pay for it."

Almogi reported that "Israel's progress in every sphere continues without let up," but that the threats to its existence also continue.

Ben-Aharon told the delegates that "Jerusalem is one and united," with the Arab trade union branch proudly flying the Histadrut banner in East Jerusalem, an area which "just five years ago was a place of strife and murder."

Both Almogi and Ben-Aharon thanked the AFL-CIO for its support of Israel and Histadrut, and Almogi delivered a message from Prime Minister Golda Meir, who praised the AFL-CIO for putting principle above expediency.

"You made no compromises. Your stand towards problems between nations was never affected by considerations of size, wealth or power," the message said.

Ben-Aharon said encouraging signs for Israel include the growing number of Soviet Jews who "can at last rejoin their people, revive their culture and exercise their religious traditions." He vowed Israel would never forget the Jews "living in jeopardy in the Moslem countries, notably Syria and Iraq."

In a press conference before he spoke, Ben-Aharon said he was most disturbed that U.S. Sec. of State William Rogers recently left his role as arbitrator to become "a partial umpire" in negotiations for peace in the Middle East.

He said Egyptian Pres. Sadat was "cooler than Nasser" and did not seem to believe in military victory, as Nasser did. However, Ben-Aharon said he thought Sadat "probably has hopes that Russia will eventually dominate the area and impose a 'theatre of peace.' "

Study Backed On Conglomerate Ties

Bal Harbour, Fla.—An investigation of the interlocking relationships of corporations, banks and other business institutions was called for by the AFL-CIO convention to measure their impact on democracy and collective bargaining.

The delegates voted support for a Senate resolution introduced by Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.) to set up a special investigating committee.

The resolution noted that "free collective bargaining and democratic unionism are threatened by the increased economic power of absentee management of far-flung and varied operations of giant conglomerates." The anti-trust laws have proven ineffective in the face of the wave of mergers and the growth of the conglomerates, the resolution said.

Funds, Enforcement Urged As Pollution Controls Lag

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Federal, regional and state enforcement of anti-pollution legislation has not been adequate, the AFL-CIO convention declared as it urged a concentrated crackdown on all violators, revision of federal pollution agencies, passage of additional legislation and federal grants for sewage treatment facilities.

"At least $3 billion each year for the next five years should be appropriated by Congress for federal grants to assist municipalities in construction or modification of sewage treatment plants," the convention said.

"Such a program could create more than 250,000 new jobs, many in areas of high unemployment, with a multiplier effect, adding as many as 300,000 additional new jobs. To assist needy communities, the present 66 percent federal matching ceiling should be increased to 80 percent."

Delegates stipulated that each state plan for pollution abatement require river basin planning as the foundation of its program as a condition of receiving federal approval and financial assistance.

Delegates noted that changes in industrial processes to stop air and water pollution may "cost jobs in one area and gain them in another sector."

"Workers, however, are badly in need of protection against environmental blackmail by management and possible misrepresentation of job loss resulting from the cost of complying with a government abatement order and where companies threaten to leave and relocate in another state or locality, whose laws and enforcement programs are softer on polluters."

To provide that protection, delegates proposed that amendments to the air and water pollution acts set up national standards on all existing stationary sources of air and water pollution.

"The amendment should provide that any employer alleging that an abatement order will cause layoffs, dismissals or cessation of operations, must prove its case before an administrative hearing called by the federal agency involved."

Any company that fails to prove such a relationship, should be subject to civil penalties, the convention declared.

Delegates urged that the Commerce Dept.'s National Oceanic & Atmospheric Administration and the Army Corps of Engineers Refuse Administration both be transferred to the Environmental Protection Agency.

The responsibilities of the two agencies should be expanded "to cover intra-state as well as interstate navigable waters, underground waters, lakes, estuaries, the contiguous coastal areas and appurtenant land."

The convention also supported amendments to the Water Pollution Control Act which would:

- Require all industrial concerns releasing effluents into water to measure and report the kinds and quality of such effluents to the federal government.
- Provide for issuance of immediate abatement orders enforced by federal court orders. Civil and criminal penalties for violators should be stiffened, the convention said. The Federal Refuse Act should be made an important enforcement tool.

The convention called for increased emphasis on solid waste technology particularly urging separation, recycling and re-use of solid wastes.

"A broad and systematic program should give full consideration to human values, including the jobs of workers in the private sector as well as those employed in the disposal field."

Developing Countries Seek Aid of U.S. Labor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The trade unions in the world's emerging nations can be the bulwarks of democracy, the Prime Minister of Jamaica told the AFL-CIO convention, but to perform that role, they must have the help of the unions in the developed, industrialized countries.

Hugh Lawson Shearer, who recalled growing up in the trade union movement in Jamaica, thanked the AFL-CIO for the help Jamaica has received from the various government agencies and from the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

"There is a continuing need for such support in education, training, organizational techniques and technical assistance," Shearer said. "I urge you to continue to take an interest in the problems of your fellow workers outside your own country."

He said he understood U.S. unions' complaints about unfair competition from "cheap foreign labor," and said he would never defend "these cases where goods are deliberately dumped or where workers are cruelly exploited with long hours for starvation wages."

But Shearer said such titles as "cheap foreign labor" should not be used when "differences in workers' wages merely reflect differences between the huge productive capacity of the developed country and that of other countries."

He called for solutions to trade problems which would protect workers in both countries, "for if we are to be able to buy the goods you produce and pay back the loans we borrow, we must be able to sell in your markets the products we are best able to produce."

Shearer pointed out that in some U.S. industries, half of the products weren't known 10 years ago. "We would hope that it is in this area of technological development that the wealthy countries would seek a solution to their problems, leaving the simpler tasks to be carried out by the small developing countries."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany praised Shearer's remarks to the convention as a "lucid, rational analysis of the problems of a people in an undeveloped country." Meany said Shearer made clear how the lives of the people in those nations can be affected by decisions of the "the so-called wealthy countries of the world."

HUGH SHEARER

National Energy Policy Essential To Protecting Natural Resources

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO convention renewed the federation's call for a comprehensive natural resources and energy policy, integrated with a full-employment economic policy.

Such action, the convention said, would "protect and preserve the environment, protect the interests of the consuming public and eliminate duplications of functions and waste among the scattered federal resources departments and agencies." Since 1959, the AFL-CIO has urged legislation creating a low-cost, bulk power supply available to all electric companies.

"A long-range national policy is needed that will influence the percent of America's future energy requirements supplied by oil, natural gas, coal and uranium. Such a policy should develop a rational pattern of research, development and conservation of energy resources. Resolution of problems of costs, supply, monopolization, pollution and the necessary restructuring of the federal agencies engaged in these fields."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council had reported to the convention that energy costs and prices are rapidly increasing and that there is a mounting dependency on foreign sources of energy fuels.

Electric power reserve levels are so dangerously low in many regions, the council reported, that there is a constant threat of brownouts and blackouts, a situation that has persisted since the mid-1960s.

"Just as the President is now advised by a statuatory Council of Environmental Advisers, a similarly constituted Council on National Energy Policy should be created by Congress," the convention said.

It urged Congress to establish development programs for the nation's enormous oil shale resources and for utilization of domestic coal reserves by converting them into supplies of low-pollution natural gas.

The convention reiterated the AFL-CIO position favoring the development of nuclear power as an alternative source of energy and supporting congressional authorization for a demonstration reactor to be developed and operated by the Atomic Energy Commission.

At the same time, however, delegates demanded protection for workers and the public against hazardous elements, such as plutonium, used by these reactors.

"While we endorse the recent strengthening by the Atomic Energy Commission of its standards governing release of airborne radioactive materials to the general environment, we insist that such reductions be made to apply to all radiation workers as well."

Delegates asked Congress to investigate energy-source monopolization and the failure of the Federal Power Commission and the Dept. of the Interior to provide "adequate protection of the public against energy monopolies."

In 10-Point Program:

Full Employment Tops Labor's Goals

productive capacity, "the amount of slack is now so great that only decisive government action can begin to turn the economy around rapidly, toward full employment."

The delegates said that for the unemployed and seriously underemployed, improvement and enlargement of the public-service jobs program are required.

"Moreover, immediate increases in public investment to create jobs and lift the economy would mesh with American society's long-range need for greatly expanded public facilities and services."

The convention underscored the need for federal expansionary measures by emphasizing that reduced unemployment would increase the volume of production and reduce pressures on costs and prices.

"Government efforts to drive down interest rates would ease inflationary pressures throughout the economy, while encouraging job-creating expansion."

The delegates reiterated the often-stated position of the AFL-CIO that the President should release the billions of dollars of appropriated funds for public service programs that would create thousands of jobs in a variety of essential programs.

They also urged Congress to vote full funding of federal programs to meet the nation's public investment needs "in such areas as education, health care, low- and moderate-income housing, pollution controls and community facilities."

"In addition, a special program of federal grants to states, local governments and federal agencies is required to accelerate short-term public works construction and repairs in areas of high unemployment."

Such grants could be a key to reconversion by offsetting the declining defense proportion of national production with an increased emphasis on public investment, the resolution said.

"They would also boost government revenues as employment and incomes rise—the soundest way to reduce the federal budget deficits that have resulted from the engineered recession and stretched-out sluggishness."

The delegates asked Congress to expand credit for badly needed housing and public projects, but at the same time called for curbs on credit for such activities as "conglomerate takeovers, land speculation and foreign subsidiaries."

Another basic prerequisite of economic growth, the convention said, is an end to the stagnation of the real incomes of American workers —"to provide workers with a share of the benefits of economic progress and to establish the foundation for the needed expansion of consumer markets."

"Rapid economic growth will not be possible without a substantial boost to consumer sales, which account for almost two-thirds of the national economy."

Group Health Studies Urged In All Cities

Bal Harbour, Fla.—State and city central bodies were urged by the AFL-CIO convention to work with other community groups to explore the possibility of establishing prepaid group practice health plans.

In communities that do not have such plans, a central body committee should be established and include representatives from local health and welfare plans, the resolution suggested.

The federation also called on affiliates "to include a dual choice option in their collective bargaining demands for health insurance benefits so that each member may have the opportunity to join a prepaid group practice plan should the opportunity arise."

Delegates Protest Move To Undermine BLS Role

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO convention condemned and opposed what it termed the Nixon's Administration's "effort to destroy the credibility of the Bureau of Labor Statistics" and demanded "its retention as an honest and fair public service."

It charged the Administration with attempting to make the BLS a "self-serving propaganda agency."

The action was in reference to the Administration's shakeup of the BLS operation in which key career personnel were shifted or downgraded and in which the interpretation of economic data was separated from the collection and analysis of such information.

An Office of Data Analysis is being planned to interpret such key economic indicators as the Consumer Price Index and unemployment and productivity figures. Recently the BLS discontinued quarterly reports on employment and unemployment in the nation's ghettos, and earlier this year, the BLS suspended monthly press briefings on the national CPI and unemployment reports.

"This attempt on the part of the Nixon Administration to hoodwink and propagandize the American public can result only in erasing the future credibility of both the BLS and the Administration," the convention said.

It pointed out that the BLS has operated on a high level of technical competence through succeeding national administrations and that "its staff has presented fairly and honestly, basic data on which interested persons and organizations could rely. The bureau has built up a high public regard for its abilities, its nonpartisanship and its unswerving dedication to integrity."

THESE DELEGATES to the AFL-CIO convention represented more than 13 million union members in the United States. The resolutions they acted on charted labor's policies for the next two years. The raised platform was for cameramen covering the convention.

Cutbacks in Federal Programs Assailed as Poverty Rolls Grow

Bal Harbour, Fla.—At a time when the number of people living in poverty is swelling, the Nixon Administration is attempting to downgrade the federal anti-poverty effort, the AFL-CIO convention charged.

The Office of Economic Opportunity should be continued as an independent agency, fully funded and with such services as child care, legal aid and community action programs, a convention resolution declared.

While noting that federal programs alone cannot end poverty—that a full employment, expanding national economy is also needed—the convention pointed out that federal assistance is indispensable since 1.2 million people were added to the poverty list last year.

At a time when the anti-poverty program should be expanded, the Nixon Administration cut the budget request for OEO for fiscal 1972 below the level of the previous year, the first year in the program's history that it has not been increased, the resolution said.

"We urge the continuation of OEO as an agency that will serve as a 'command post' for the anti-poverty effort and a visible symbol to the poor of the nation's continuing commitment to end poverty," the convention declared.

It also called for the inclusion of two new titles in the renewal of the Economic Opportunity Act. One is a non-profit Legal Services Corporation and the other a comprehensive child development program.

The resolution opposed turning the anti-poverty program over to state governments or transferring it to old-line agencies.

"Even if Congress rejects the Administration's proposals for government reorganization and revenue-sharing, it is quite evident that changes will be made in OEO by executive order," the resolution said. "Already VISTA has been merged into a new composite agency, several neighborhood health centers have been 'spun-off' to HEW with the probability that the entire program may ultimately be sent over to HEW."

The resolution cautioned that "OEO would disappear and the component programs would be swallowed up in the new super agencies they propose."

While granting "that a small number of community action agencies have acted irresponsibly," the convention said that was no excuse for trying to dismantle them.

"Programs developed by community action agencies have helped many to move out of poverty, the resolution noted, "but equally important, community action programs have created a forum for the poor from which they can speak to the larger community."

Leadership skills and programs attuned to the real needs of the poor have been developed from the community action programs, the convention added, and "the overwhelming majority of CAP agencies have functioned in a responsible manner and tried to serve the poor in their communities in a constructive way."

The resolution noted that organized labor has played an important role in OEO, but in the past two years the relationship between the AFL-CIO and the OEO "has undergone substantial change; it is on a more formal basis than in the past."

To correct that trend, the convention cited the recent reactivation of the OEO Labor Advisory Committee and called for close labor liaison with OEO and the training of union members for active participation in OEO programs.

Radio Free Europe Fund Study Asked

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Any uncertainty over the future of Radio Free Europe should be removed by immediate congressional action, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

Referring to the government's decision to halt covert funding of Radio Free Europe as "wise," the convention called for an extension on its interim funding pending further study of a permanent mechanism.

All-Out Drive Pledged To Raise Wage Floor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO set both immediate and future goals for improvement of the Fair Labor Standards Act—and pledged an all-out drive to accomplish them.

The immediate goal, in effect, is prompt enactment of the best possible minimum wage bill that can be pushed through Congress.

A convention resolution noted that the House Labor Committee has approved legislation to raise the federal wage floor from the present $1.60 level to $2 an hour. And a bill being considered in the Senate Labor Committee would raise the pay floor to $2.25.

Both bills provide some additional coverage and close several of the exemption loopholes in the present law.

The convention pledged the AFL-CIO "to continue to give top priority support to the maximum immediate improvement feasible" in this Congress.

But the resolution pointed out that even if the labor-supported legislation is enacted, workers receiving the minimum wage will be "near the current poverty level and far below the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics' lower living standard budget." And it warned that "future increases in the cost of living will worsen this situation."

Furthermore, the convention noted, millions of workers would still be left unprotected or only partially protected by the wage-hour law. "The workweek will still be at the 1938 level and prevent a sharp increase in employment. Puerto Rican workers will still be discriminated against. Farm workers will still get second-class treatment. And young people will still suffer from sub-minimums."

The convention pledged that in future action on Fair Labor Standards Act amendments, the AFL-CIO will seek:

- A minimum wage of at least $2.50 an hour.
- Full wage and hours coverage for all workers.
- Equal protection under the law for farm workers, whose minimum currently is below the pay floor for other covered workers.
- The same protection for workers in Puerto Rico as on the mainland.
- Elimination of all subminimums for youth.

A separate resolution strongly reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's support for coverage of domestic workers under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Domestic workers have long been exploited, the convention said, and the time has come to include them "in the mainstream of economic life" through coverage by the federal wage-hour law.

Real Reforms Urged to Aid Needy Families

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor stands firm in its support for "early enactment of genuine welfare reform under federal financing and administration."

A convention resolution asked the Senate to raise the minimum basic family assistance payment from the $2,400 in the bill passed by the House to $3,000.

And within a few years, the amount should be raised to "no less than the poverty level," which is currently $3,900.

The legislation should ensure, the convention said, that:

- No payments should be reduced below current levels.
- No welfare recipient should be referred to a job paying less than the minimum wage.
- No mother should be referred to work in the absence of adequate child care facilities for her children.
- The job rights and employment conditions of state and local employes who presently administer welfare must be protected when the federal government takes over the program.

If these changes were enacted, the resolution said, it would mark "the first step toward the genuine reform of the welfare system" that labor has long urged.

But it would only be the first step. And "the AFL-CIO will continue to work for a welfare program that will provide adequate income for the needy who are unable to work, training programs leading to suitable jobs at decent pay for all those who can work, and expand child care, health, counseling, rehabilitation and other supportive services."

The resolution concluded that only such a welfare program "will be fair to recipients and taxpayers alike" and restore "hope and dignity to millions of disadvantaged Americans."

Delegates Spur Congress On Child Care Bill

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress was urged by the AFL-CIO to complete action on comprehensive child care legislation for working mothers.

The problem is most acute for the already disadvantaged children of the poor, the convention noted, but it is not confined to them. The number of working mothers has almost doubled in only six years, but there has been only a minute expansion of day care facilities for children.

Furthermore, the resolution stressed, there is increasing pressure to force mothers on welfare rolls to take jobs "even when it means the minimum of custodial care, or no care at all for her children."

The AFL-CIO warned that "if these children spend their early years neglected in a back room or left to roam the streets unattended, the next generation will face problems much more severe than the cost of welfare."

A bill that would make a significant start towards a nationwide program of community-run child care and development centers has been approved by a House-Senate conference committee and is scheduled for final action in the next few weeks.

Under it, the resolution noted, "planning, operation and administration of programs will take place at the local level through the partnership of parents, community and local government."

CHECKING COMMITTEE reports to the convention were federation Vice Presidents Jerry Wurf, left, and Joseph A. Beirne. The delegates adopted 78 resolutions of nearly 200 submitted to the convention.

New Agency Proposed To Beef Up Food Safety

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called for enactment of new and more efficient food inspection legislation and the creation of a federal agency whose sole purpose would be the protection of consumers from tainted food.

The delegates declared in a resolution that all existing food protection functions such as meat, poultry and egg inspection as well as the food responsibilities of the Food & Drug Administration, should be integrated into the new agency.

The convention also emphasized that any new inspection legislation should be broad enough to include fish and all other foods "which currently undergo only a comparatively meaningless check once every few years by the FDA."

And the resolution demanded that the Nixon Administration stop "politicking with consumer health."

"Despite the efforts of the Meat Cutters to provide strong consumer protection in new meat and poultry inspection legislation, these programs are in deep crisis," the convention said.

"The laws are satisfactory but their administration and enforcement by the Nixon Administration has been shocking."

"Efforts to favor industry, weakening of consumer protection to aid state bureaucracies, cutbacks in protection because of the unwillingness to spend federal money, refusal to permit any participation by consumers in the inspection program and lack of candor about existing difficulties are only a few of the problems which have taken a dreadful toll in the integrity of inspection."

The convention maintained that the FDA has been ineffective in safeguarding the health of the nation.

"Actions by the Nixon Administration to aid its corporate political partners have brought the FDA to still greater losses of morale and still greater inability to perform its consumer protective jobs. The agency is now shell-shocked from its many failures, unable to say 'no' to industry pressures, and impoverished in its funds and manpower."

The resolution emphasized that the crisis in consumer protection could not have come at a worse possible time—"for new chemical compounds and new technologies pose even more questions to the health and safety of consumers."

"Professional judgments to erase consumer hazards quickly, rather than toadying apologies for offending industries, are absolutely essential."

As examples of lax inspection techniques, the convention cited the occurrence of botulism in the soups of well-known companies and the fouling of foods packed in recycled cardboard containers.

Dr. King's Birthday Urged as Holiday

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s birthday, Jan. 15, should be proclaimed by Congress as a legal holiday, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

Delegates pledged to continue "efforts to bring about the day when the dream of Dr. King for dignity, justice and peace for all shall be fully realized."

The assassination of Dr. King in 1968 during a strike by Memphis, Tenn., sanitation workers "was a great loss to all Americans, robbing our nation of a leader of men, advocate of brotherhood and understanding and fighter for equality and justice."

'Time Is Ripe':

Health Security Remains Key Goal

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"The time is ripe for enactment of National Health Security," the AFL-CIO declared.

A convention resolution reaffirmed the labor movement's pledge that enactment of the Health Security program "is and will remain our number one legislative goal until victory has been won."

The resolution examined the major alternative proposals to National Health Security—and found them clearly inferior.

Of the plans advanced by the American Medical Association and the insurance industry, it adopted the conclusion of the AFL-CIO Executive Council that these are "thinly disguised efforts to protect vested interests and insurance company profits. They are bandaids, where surgery is required."

As for the Administration plan, "The President's proposals do not match the liberal rhetoric of his health message" and are "far short of meeting the 'massive crisis' in health care the President proclaimed."

As an example of the contradiction, the resolution noted that Nixon's message had called for "equal access to health services for all citizens."

But when the Administration plan was unveiled, it did not cover the long-term unemployed, public employes, migratory workers and part-time employes.

Likewise, Nixon's message asked more attention "to treating illness in its early stages." But his plan, the resolution observed, "provides for substantial deductions and co-insurance payments by beneficiaries which place financial barriers to early treatment and preventive care."

In contrast to the alternative plans, the convention resolution cited these key ingredients of the labor-backed National Health Security bill:

- Universal coverage whether employed or unemployed.
- Comprehensive benefits without deductibles or co-insurance, no exclusions, no waiting periods, no limitations on physical examinations and other preventive services.
- Free choice of physician.
- Financing through social security with matching contributions from federal revenues.
- Provision for a Health Resources Development Fund to be used for health manpower education and training, group practices development and for expanding and improving health services.
- Effective cost controls.

The AFL-CIO resolution noted "a remarkable consensus . . . on the nature and causes of the health care crisis."

It observed that, in addition to the proposals of the various organized interests and the Administration, a number of bills have been introduced by individual senators and congressmen. And "many more bills can be expected in the months ahead as national health insurance is debated."

To date, at any rate, the convention said, all of the proposals advanced lack some important provisions that are in the National Health Security plan.

The resolution concluded:

"In view of the many failings of the other proposals, the AFL-CIO reaffirms its strong endorsement of National Health Security. Only Health Security meets the goal of providing medical care as a right for all Americans."

Legion Chief Cites Veterans' Need for Jobs

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Vietnam-era veterans "deserve a better welcome home than being consigned to the welfare rolls," National Commander John H. Geiger of the American Legion told the AFL-CIO convention.

"This country that asked them to serve in its armed forces is the most affluent in the history of mankind, and that affluence must be made to work for the returning veteran by providing him with the opportunity for suitable employment whereby he can provide for his needs and maintain his dignity as an American citizen," Geiger said.

He said the American Legion is vitally concerned with jobs for veterans.

"Jobs for veterans is a priority program of the Legion initiated over a year ago and reaffirmed at our most recent national convention."

Inter-Union Cooperation Stressed As Vital to Organizing Progress

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Cooperation among AFL-CIO unions is essential to organizing success, convention delegates stressed in a major resolution.

The resolution was based on an Executive Council report that organizing gains in the private sector of the economy have been slowed by a tough anti-union campaign by employers, coupled with a National Labor Relations Board that is being transformed through Pres. Nixon's appointments to reflect "an anti-union, pro-employer interpretation and administration of the labor act."

Against this backdrop, the convention said, "the skill of the individual organizer must be of a higher order and the emphasis placed by unions on their organizing mission of greater intensity."

It called on affiliates "to assure that their organizing program receives the necessary money, material and trained manpower."

It is "crucial" to eliminate organizational conflict between unions, the convention said.

But beyond elimination of needless rivalry, the resolution urged the importance of active cooperation in organizing campaigns.

There are times in organizing campaigns "when it is important to call on other unions for cooperation." And when such a call is made, the convention urged, the cooperation should be quickly forthcoming. "This is the rationale of federation."

The convention resolution called on affiliates "to take part in cooperative organizing programs initiated by the AFL-CIO, whether on a territorial, industrial, company or work location basis."

And the resolution included a reminder of the deeper purpose behind labor's organizing effort—to enable workers to use the machinery of collective bargaining "to provide answers to their problems on the job, to give expression to their hopes and protection from their fears."

It reaffirmed also labor's conviction that "the American concept of trade unionism still offers working men and women the most effective procedures for attaining economic stability for themselves and their families, while contributing to the social progress and general welfare of the community."

Legislation Needed:

Equal Union Rights Set as Federal Goal

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO looked to the day when federal employes will have union rights, pay and working conditions at least equal to the private sector—and pledged its support to achieve these goals.

The convention gave its endorsement to a legislative program drafted by 29 affiliated unions with members working for the federal government.

It termed it "vital" to correct by legislation a long list of "serious deficiencies" in the Presidential executive orders that govern union-management relations in the federal service.

And through resolutions and in discussions from the floor, the convention strongly protested Pres. Nixon's action in ordering a six-month postponement of "already overdue" pay raises for federal workers.

They are being forced to bear "an unjust share of the economic burden imposed on American workers under Pres. Nixon's wage-price freeze policy," the convention resolution declared.

Among its major recommendations was a call for legislation providing collective bargaining machinery to set federal salaries. At present, only postal workers in the largely autonomous U.S. Postal Service, have the right to bargain on wages.

And in a separate resolution, applying to all public employes throughout the nation, the convention called for repeal of repressive laws and granting to public workers the same right to strike accorded workers in private industry.

During floor discussion on the resolutions:

- Pres. John F. Griner of the American Federation of Government Employes said federal employes are aroused at having been made "the principal whipping boy" of the Administration's wage-freeze policy.

He stressed the resolution's call for major revisions in the Hatch Act bar to political participation by federal workers.

- Pres. Francis S. Filbey of the newly-merged American Postal Workers told the convention that the spontaneous strike that broke out in the postal service in 1970—which led to the negotiation and enactment of collective bargaining machinery — "would never have been brought to a successful conclusion" without the personal role of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, his executive assistant, James Gildea, Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller and the full support of the labor movement.

The main convention resolution said the present ban on any form of union security is "particularly limiting to good labor-management relations" in the federal service.

It spelled out the weaknesses in the existing bargaining mechanism in government and the steps that should be taken to correct them. In summary, the resolution declared, federal employes should have union rights "similar to those available to private industry."

The resolution, nearly seven pages in length, covered the entire range of working conditions, benefits, regulations and individual rights in the federal service.

It cited the need for improvement in the Civil Service retirement system.

It called for an active union role in job safety programs in which the federal government is an employer as well as the administrator of the law.

It asked the government as an employer to pay the full cost of health and life insurance benefits for its workers.

And it urged Congress to enact legislation to correct the "serious invasions of the privacy and other constitutional rights of federal employes."

RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE considered some 200 proposals submitted to the AFL-CIO convention. The committee, shown here at a full session, divided into subcommittees to deal with assigned subject areas.

Protection of National Laws Urged for State-Local Workers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The exclusion of state and local government employes from federal protective legislation was deplored by the AFL-CIO convention which called for passage of laws to remedy that situation.

In related action, the convention urged Congress as well as states and cities to enact laws guaranteeing public employes the rights of self-organization and collective bargaining.

"If harmonious labor relations in the public sector are to be achieved, public employes must be guaranteed the right to self-organization, to form, join and assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively over all matters concerning terms and conditions of employment through representatives of their own choosing," the convention declared.

Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes, who served as chairman of the reporting resolutions subcommittee, underscored the need for public employe bargaining laws by introducing an AFSCME member from Peoria, Ill., who had just completed a 60-day jail term in connection with a 1969 strike there.

The business agent, Harold Benedict, was imprisoned as the result of a no-strike injunction which the State of Illinois later admitted should never have been issued, Wurf noted.

Delegates applauded Benedict after Wurf reported that Benedict managed to organize all the guards before leaving the Peoria jail.

On the extension of federal protections, the delegates urged Congress to bring employes of state and local governments under the Fair Labor Standards Act, Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Occupational Safety & Health Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and unemployment insurance laws.

The convention also called on Congress to enact legislation that would safeguard the pension rights of all public employes, since they are excluded from the Welfare & Pension Fund Disclosure Act.

The convention emphasized that a "glaring injustice" has been dealt the nation's approximately 10 million state and local employes because they have not been afforded the protections Congress has offered to private sector workers—regarding minimum wages, overtime, civil rights, pensions, unemployment insurance and health and safety standards on the job.

There is a misunderstanding that public employes do not need these protections or that Congress is powerless to enact them, the resolution said.

"This is not true. The ability of Congress to assert jurisdiction for work standard purposes over public employment is now firmly established."

The U.S. Supreme Court already has ruled in such an instance, upholding the 1966 extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act to more than 2 million employes of public hospitals, schools and related institutions.

"The Act, however, still falls far short of the scope of minimum wage protection that this country should provide its low-wage employes. It fails to give equal pay for equal work protection to the majority of women employed by states and political subdivisions," the convention said.

State, county and municipal employes are totally excluded from Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, and the convention found that public employers are "not only engaging in flagrant discriminatory practices against minority-group individuals, but showing little interest in correcting the situation."

Although workers in the private sector have been covered by the unemployment insurance system for more than 30 years, only 16 percent of public employes will be so covered by July 1, 1972.

Convention Re-Elects Top Federation Officers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and the 33 vice presidents of the federation were re-elected by acclamation at the ninth convention.

Meany, the first and only president of the AFL-CIO, was accorded a standing ovation by the delegates as he was named to his ninth two-year term. Thanking the convention, Meany said:

"I am keenly aware of some trying days ahead, some troublesome times. . . . I face those times with complete confidence in the solidarity of this movement and the determination of this movement to preserve its freedom."

Kirkland, re-elected to his second two-year term, told the convention that "your actions have underscored the fact that today more than ever the trade union movement is the main driving force in the struggle for human freedom and human progress."

Earlier the convention had voted to amend the AFL-CIO Constitution and increase the salary of the federation president from $70,000 to $90,000 per year and the salary of the secretary-treasurer from $45,000 to $60,000. The salaries of the top executive officers had last been increased in 1965.

On his return to Washington, Meany personally delivered to Pay Board Chairman George Boldt a letter declaring that he had ordered the AFL-CIO comptroller to withhold payment of the increases to himself and Kirkland until the Pay Board had given its approval.

Re-elected to the Executive Council were the following vice presidents: Joseph Curran, M. A. Hutcheson, Joseph D. Keenan, Jacob Potofsky, A. Philip Randolph, Richard F. Walsh, Lee W. Minton, Joseph A. Beirne, James A. Suffridge, Karl F. Feller, Peter T. Schoemann, Paul Hall, I. W. Abel, David Sullivan, Hunter P. Wharton, Paul Jennings, William Pollock, Max Greenberg, John H. Lyons, A. F. Grospiron, Matthew Guinan, C. L. Dennis, Peter Bommarito, Peter Fosco, Thomas W. Gleason, John F. Griner, Charles Luna, Frederick O'Neal, Floyd E. Smith, Louis Stulberg, Jerry Wurf, S. Frank Raftery, Alexander J. Rohan.

Full Employment Aim Tied to Job Training

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Any comprehensive, national manpower policy must have the goal of full employment as a basic prerequisite if it is to have any meaning, the AFL-CIO convention declared as it called for consolidation and federal control of existing programs.

In the establishment of manpower programs in both the public and private sectors of the economy, the delegates insisted on "provision of adequate wage and working standards."

"Wages, under these programs, should be at least at the level of the federal minimum wage or the prevailing rate of pay for the occupation, whichever is higher."

"Manpower programs should not be used to subsidize low-wage, substandard employers and to undermine the wage and working standards of other workers, to aid runaways, to subsidize high labor turnover or jobs which do not call for training before hire," the convention said.

It insisted that when the regular job-creating channels in the economy, both private and public, do not create enough jobs, the federal government must provide enough funds for a large-scale, public-service employment program.

"Such a program to create jobs for the unemployed and seriously underemployed would provide badly needed services in hospitals, schools, fire and police departments, recreational facilities, sanitation, pollution controls and other state, local and federal government facilities," delegates noted.

The Public Service Employment Act of 1971 was hailed as an important initial step despite the fact that it only provides 150,000 jobs and that it only operates when the unemployment rate remains above 4.5 percent for three consecutive months.

What is needed, the delegates emphasized, is a broadened policy that would consolidate the multiple and various federally supported manpower programs under one consolidated administration in the Dept. of Labor.

"Over the past 10 years, new manpower agencies have come into being with conflicting and overlapping jurisdictions."

As part of the consolidation, the convention urged that the U.S. Employment Service be federalized "to enforce higher standards of performance by state employment service agencies and to assure that the service will pattern its operations according to the needs of the workers and employers to match workers with job openings and not be hemmed in by community and state boundaries."

To Achieve Justice

IT IS OUR DUTY to report to the membership of the AFL-CIO and to the working people of America that the wage control mechanism established by the President of the United States is being used as a device to destroy the basic American concept of free collective bargaining.

The trade union movement joined the Pay Board on the basis of a commitment from the President that it would be tripartite and independent and that the public members would be citizens of high repute, knowledgeability and neutrality. That commitment has not been kept.

We must now report that the public members, so-called, are not independent but rather are handmaidens of the Administration. They are not neutral but have long ties either to industry or to government. In fact, one is still on the government payroll and another was a government official until the day before his appointment to the Pay Board.

As one of its first acts, the Pay Board—by a 10-5 vote with the industry and the so-called public members acting in concert—nullified thousands of legal contracts covering millions of workers.

We flatly reject the concept that anyone—be it Pay Board or President—has the power to abrogate any legal collective bargaining agreement or any other contract voluntarily and legally entered into by American citizens or their representatives. If we were to take any other position, then every contract—mortgage, corporate bond issue, sales contract or any other form of agreement voluntarily entered into by American citizens—would be subject to abrogation in similar fashion, a concept we reject without equivocation.

There is little hope that economic justice can be achieved by this Board, the majority of whom are guided by the dictates of the Administration or the interests of big business.

AGAINST THIS background, the AFL-CIO Executive Council recommends to the Convention:

1. That our representatives remain on the Pay Board only so long as a reasonable hope exists of securing recognition of the validity of contracts and of achieving justice for working people generally—including, most particularly, those with low or substandard incomes and those without the protection of strong bargaining representatives.

Until these objectives are assured, labor cannot associate itself with the actions of the Board or encourage cooperation with their administration or enforcement.

2. That the unions of the AFL-CIO insist at every level on the validity of their contracts in all their terms and in all their particulars, and that they take every lawful action at their command to insure that their contracts are honored.

3. That the AFL-CIO continue the legislative effort in the Congress to protect the validity of contracts.

We will not relax for a moment our fight to increase the standard of life and livelihood for those at the bottom of the economic ladder—those whom the majority of the Pay Board seem to have forgotten.

We repeat what we have said in the past:

The American labor movement will not permit itself to become the scapegoat for Administration policies which have brought this nation to the brink of economic disaster.

Convention Resolution:

10-Point Program Spelled Out To Block Off Tax Loopholes

Excerpts from the resolution on Tax Reform adopted by the AFL-CIO convention:

THE TAX REFORM ACT of 1969 represented a forward step down the road to tax justice. Some loopholes were trimmed and some relief was given to the poor and to wage and salary earners who have borne more than their fair share of the nation's tax burden. But, the tax structure is still full of loopholes of special privilege for wealthy people and corporations. It still remains rigged against wages and salaries which are taxed in full while only half of capital gains are subject to taxation and some other forms of income are not taxed at all.

The AFL-CIO urges the Congress and the Administration to redress these inequities and complete the unfinished business of achieving tax justice.

1—The Administration-proposed business tax giveaways included in the Revenue Act now before the Congress will cost the American taxpayer and the federal Treasury some $75 billion over the 1970 decade. They should be rejected. The so-called Job Development Investment Credit will create few, if any, jobs. The depreciation provisions result in a huge business tax giveaway and at the same time completely destroy the concept of profits for tax purposes. The Domestic International Sales Corporation (DISC) gimmick permits corporations to spin off into export subsidiaries in order to defer taxes—perhaps indefinitely—on export income. Yet, no valid evidence has been given that exports would, in fact, increase.

2—We call for immediate enactment of an excess-profits tax. Such a tax should remain in effect during any period in which the wages of workers are subject to freezes, controls, or restraints.

3—Top priority must be given to closing the capital-gains loophole. The preferential half-tax rate which applies to gains on unearned income from stocks or other property sold at a profit and the zero tax that applies to such gains when passed on at death are the most disruptive elements in our tax structure. We believe that there cannot be tax justice so long as unearned income is half-taxed while earned income is taxed in full.

4—The special tax privileges of the oil, gas and other mineral industries should be completely ended.

5—The tax exemption for interest income from state and local bonds should be disallowed. Such income should be taxed in full, with the federal government guaranteeing the bonds and providing an interest-subsidy to assure that the fiscal powers of the state and local governments are not hampered.

6—The minimum-tax provisions of the 1969 Tax Reform Act which require some tax payments on the part of individuals with large amounts of income from tax sheltered sources such as capital gains, real estate depreciation, oil depletion, and hobby farms should be strengthened.

7—The maximum-tax provisions of the 1969 Act which provide an uncalled for tax bonanza to top corporate executives and others whose income comes from very high fees and salaries should be eliminated.

8—There should be complete elimination of the many business tax measures which contribute to the alarming trend of corporate mergers and acquisitions and spur the growth of huge multinational corporations. New tax measures should be enacted to halt the export of U.S. jobs, remove the incentive to establish production and assembly facilities abroad, and create tax disincentives to curb expanded production abroad.

9—In addition to the reforms in the federal individual and corporate income tax, a major overhaul of federal estate and gift taxes is a prerequisite to the achievement of tax justice. Present law provides a host of opportunities to minimize or entirely avoid these taxes or postpone payment for generations through devices such as income splitting, family trusts and gifts.

10—Elimination of these loopholes of special tax privilege for wealthy families and corporations would increase federal revenue by billions of additional dollars each year. It would provide the funds needed to improve and increase public facilities and services in the coming years. It would also provide the basis for a reduction in the relative tax burdens of low- and middle-income taxpayers.

Finally, the AFL-CIO urges a continuing vigil to assure the rejection of all tax devices and gimmicks that run counter to the goals of tax justice. These include proposals such as the value-added tax, which is simply a national sales tax masquerading under a new name, or the addition of new so-called business tax-incentive schemes.

Meany's Rebuttal:

No Discourtesy to President Despite Some Ruffled Feathers

Excerpts from remarks by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the convention, Nov. 22:

THE ACCUSATIONS of discourtesy on the part of the AFL-CIO in connection with Pres. Nixon's visit of last Friday are absolutely and completely untrue and unfair. I didn't hear any booing; I didn't hear any jeering on the part of the delegates during the President's visit.

I would like to go over this whole record and try to set it straight. On the 23rd of September I invited the President of the United States to address this convention, and this is in accordance with a long-time practice. No matter who the President is, he is the first man we invite to our convention. A few days later I received a reply from George Shultz which said that the President would, of course, consider this and look over his schedule and they would be in touch with us a little later.

Well, seven weeks passed with no word of any kind. There was no word as to whether he was coming, no word that he was not coming. Last Wednesday evening at half past eight in the evening I was in the coffee shop downstairs, and I got a telephone call from George Shultz in which he said the President wanted to address our convention at noon on Thursday.

Now, to me it would seem that there was a little lack of courtesy there. He could have told us this, and we would have been glad to work out something. But this was just 12 hours before the convention was to convene. So I told him it would be impossible to make that arrangement, that there was a council meeting set for twelve noon, but that I would be glad to have the President later in the afternoon or any time he wanted on Friday.

So the Friday date was set up for 10:30 a.m. and immediately on Thursday afternoon and evening we were visited by a large number of security people whose job it is to protect the person of the President.

They did request Thursday night that I move these four tables here (in front of the platform) back in order that they could put in special television cameras. I refused to grant that request. I said that this would upset the arrangements for 80 or 90 delegates, and I felt that we had television cameras, that we had tape television, and I didn't feel that we should change that situation.

Then I was asked would I have the orchestra play Ruffles and Flourishes as the President marched from the little door over to here. I said, "We don't have an orchestra. We have what you might call some chamber music." We had an orchestra Thursday morning. I don't think you can play Ruffles and Flourishes on a violin. I could be wrong on that, but this is my impression.

He was warmly applauded when he was introduced. He was applauded at least eight times during his speech. There was some laughter when he said that prices were coming down and if you didn't believe it to ask your wives, ask the housewives of America.

Now, I'm willing to concede that this laughter was of a type that indicated disagreement with the President, and I think the ladies laughed the loudest.

However, we certainly still have a Constitution and a Bill of Rights, and I don't know that they can take away our rights unless they actually put it in the Constitution. In other words, I still think we have a constitutional right to laugh.

When the President left here, instead of going to the office he turned and he went into this roped-off area. A White House photographer appeared and there was a fellow carrying a great big, enormous glaring light. The President started to mill around over there. Now at that time, after two or three minutes of that, the delegates and the guests from the far end of the hall all started to converge over here, and I took the mike and said, as I have said many times, "Will the delegates and guests kindly take their seats."

That is a subject of another accusation. They said that I tried to continue the business of the convention while the President still had the floor.

Well, when he left I committed the cardinal sin of saying, "Well, let's go on with the second act." But that was my reaction.

Insofar as courtesy is concerned, I think we showed the respect that is due to the President of the United States. We were not discourteous, there was no booing and there was no jeering. As far as his conduct was concerned, he gave us his speech. He threw away his written text, and that corny act is as old as the republic. His speech was pure political propaganda, and I have no objection to that because we hear a lot of that, and he certainly should not be barred from making a political speech.

However, he did not discuss the one major item upon which we differ with the Administration, and that is the validity of our contracts.

He said that he read the terms under which we were going to sit on the Pay Board and that he could do as he pleased about that, accept it or not. And he said very forcefully, "I know what I can do, and that is what I am going to do" and then he didn't tell us. But he did not, he did not discuss the issue that certainly is the major basic issue that is disturbing the trade unions of America—do we have the right to sign a contract with our employers and see that contract observed, or have we lost that right? I don't think we have, and we are not going to stop fighting for it.

I HAVE THE IMPRESSION the President did not come here to make a speech. He came here to contrive a situation under which he could claim that he had been unfairly treated.

As I say, I am proud of the conduct of the AFL-CIO. We respect the office, we respect the man that holds the office and we are going to continue to do that. However, this doesn't mean that we have got to be subservient to the man who holds the office.

This does not mean that our respect for the President and his office calls for us to submit to something that we consider unjust. Otherwise, our pride in America and its institutions would be meaningless.

This is still a democracy. This is still not a monarchy. And the respect for the President and the respect for our rights as Americans is part and parcel of the entire American way of life to which we are committed without reservation.

POLICY RESOLUTION attacking the Pay Board's nullification of thousands of union contracts was adopted at this special meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council and approved that afternoon by unanimous vote of the full convention. Presidents of a number of affiliates joined the 35 council members for the discussion.

Resolution Pays Tribute To Meany's Leadership

The following resolution was adopted unanimously by the AFL-CIO Convention:

WHEREAS, The American labor movement is fortunate, indeed, to have available to it the leadership and guidance of George Meany, and

WHEREAS, As head of a militant and strong AFL-CIO, George Meany has long since established his credentials as the spokesman for advancement of working Americans, as a leader in the national drive for social progress, and as a wise counselor and vigorous captain of those who strive for the continuing betterment of all its people, and

WHEREAS, These qualities have never been more evident, and more needed, than they have been in recent days. George Meany has once again led organized labor to the front rank of those who insist that we solve our pressing current national problems in a fair, equitable and progressive manner; therefore, be it

RESOLVED: This ninth constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO expresses its heartfelt appreciation to George Meany, President of the AFL-CIO, for his great services to the labor movement and the nation, and voices the trust that these services will continue in the years to come.

Convention Denounces North Ireland Abuses

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO convention called for withdrawal of British troops from Northern Ireland and the establishment of a United Nations peace-keeping force "until peace and reason prevails."

"We urge an immediate end to the Hitlerian policy of internment without charge or trial," which one delegate, Pres. John Driscoll of the Connecticut AFL-CIO, denounced as the equivalent of "concentration camps without trial."

"Britain does not permit that in its own country; why should it permit it to the government of Northern Ireland?" Driscoll asked.

The convention called for dissolution of the Stormont Parliament as non-representative of the half million Northern Irish Catholic minority

It noted that for the past 50 years, the government of Northern Ireland has been dominated by "aristocrats and landlords who . . . have been exploiting the working class of Northern Ireland and for their purpose have been keeping the working population divided along religious lines."

Discrimination against Catholics in employment and in housing has been an official government policy, "devised to cause unnatural divisions between the Catholic and Protestant workers of Northern Ireland," the resolution said.

The convention also urged establishment of a free and independent United Ireland "with guarantees of liberty and justice to all its people."

James Cox, a representative of the Irish Trade Union Congress, addressing the convention on the day the resolution was adopted, said the philosophy of labor organizations must be "that no man and no other nation has the right to impose limitations on the family of man—we must accept that philosophy if we are sincere."

Cox maintained that the problems in Northern Ireland are more economic and political than they are religious or sectarian, and that the Trade Union Congress unites many divergent elements of society in both the Free State and the north.

"We in our movement unite workers of every religion and all political persuasions," he said. "We have Republicans, we have Unionists, we have Socialists, we have Conservatives, we have Catholics and we have Protestants.

With such a wide representation, Cox said, the Irish Trade Union Congress is in an excellent position "to present an economic policy to the government of Northern Ireland that we are satisfied—indeed we are convinced—will pave the way for peace, progress and reconstruction. . . ."

Full Labor Support Pledged to CARE

Bal Harbour, Fla — The AFL-CIO convention called on all affiliates to provide the fullest possible financial support to CARE programs "as a means to strengthen peace and stability throughout the world."

The action marked the 25th anniversary of cooperation between the AFL-CIO and CARE which feeds millions of hungry children in depressed nations, provides schools and medical services and aids free trade unions.

Currently, CARE is bringing relief to 9 million East Pakistan refugees who have fled to India.

Delegates Ask Promotion of Union Label

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO convention designated Union Label weeks for the next two years and urged all affiliates to participate in the Union-Industries Shows in 1972 and 1973.

The convention set aside the week of Sept. 4-10 in 1972 and Sept. 3-9 in 1973 as Union Label weeks with the aim of making "the general membership of the AFL-CIO and the general public more aware of the need to buy or demand products that bear the union label."

On the Union-Industries show, the delegates noted that the federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept. "demonstrates the many skills and crafts that are performed by the members of the AFL-CIO."

"Participation by all AFL-CIO national and international unions would broaden the scope of these exhibitions and greatly expand their ability to tell the trade union story to all the nation," the convention declared.

CYRIL PLANT

HUGH SCANLON

LOUIS H. LORRAIN

Fraternal Delegates Cite Threat Posed by Multinational Firms

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The mushrooming of multinational corporations means that labor problems know no national boundaries, three foreign trade union representatives told the AFL-CIO convention.

"More and more decisions affecting millions of working people are being taken out of the national sphere," said Cyril Plant, a member of the general council at the British Trades Union Congress and one of three fraternal delegates to the AFL-CIO convention.

Americans know all about the threat, Plant said, "since multinational companies are predominantly American and it is American capital and machinery—and American employment—which is being transferred abroad simply to take advantage of lower labor costs."

Louis H. Lorrain, general vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, told the convention, "It is obviously no longer possible to look at these economic matters within the boundaries of a single country. Multinational corporations and the gamblers of the international money markets are playing a world game."

The third fraternal delegate, Hugh Scanlon, also a British TUC council member, told the AFL-CIO delegates, "we join with you in your renunciation of the establishment's traditional, continual and utterly false assumptions that the economic difficulties of our two countries are attributable to high wages, strikes, or claims for shorter hours and longer holidays."

All three called for strengthening the ties among free trade union movements around the world, with Plant pointing out it should be closer than annual exchanges at conventions, "where domestic issues and approaches quite rightly form the greater part of the proceedings."

He praised the meetings between British and U.S. labor leaders in May 1971 as helpful in the mutual problems with Lockheed and Rolls Royce. Such exchanges are particularly important, he said, because the International Labor Organization "has prompted expressions of misgivings" in both the AFL-CIO and the TUC.

Plant cited the "disruptive, time-wasting activities of delegates who have pursued political issues at the ILO." He said the TUC was concerned when the United States, "shows signs of such extreme dissatisfaction and disillusion" as withholding dues payments to the ILO, as the U.S. Congress did earlier this year.

Lorrain told the delegates that Canadian workers have been suffering from two directions at the hands of U.S. trade policies—first the surtax on imports into the United States, which is Canada's No. 1 market, then the attempted stimulation of U.S. exports into Canada through the Domestic International Sales Corporation.

"You see it (DISC) as a gift to the corporations of millions of dollars in unpaid taxes," Lorrain said. "We see it as an inducement to (U.S.) corporations to reap new profits at the expense of workers and their families."

Lorrain, who is a vice president of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers, said that "if workers in North America are to be properly represented, their unions must be international."

"It is not surprising that employers do not like international unions," Lorrain said. "They would prefer small weak and isolated organizations."

But in Pulp & Sulphite, "American and Canadian members stood side by side in opposition to the 10 percent surcharge," he said. American members may see a few more jobs from the import tax, he said, "but they didn't want that advantage at the expense of Canadian members."

Canada's economic problems are very similar to those in America, Lorrain said, with a government program to curb inflation resulting in 7.1 percent unemployment. The continuation of the surcharge could take it to 8 percent, he said.

Scanlon said he recently addressed the first demonstration against unemployment that the TUC has had to organize in 40 years. "There are nearly 1 million people unemployed," Scanlon said, and tens of thousands more would have been added by Christmas were it not for the government backing for Lockheed and Rolls Royce on which the AFL-CIO and TUC worked together.

"We assert that slumps and depressions are caused by the inability of ordinary workers to buy back the goods they produce," Scanlon said. He urged trade unionists to continue "the struggle to maintain the purchasing power of the people . . . to dissipate the slumps that would otherwise come along."

Florida's Hopes Keyed To Progressive Alliance

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A new coalition is emerging in Florida which crosses all the old lines of race, class and economic conditions and carries hopeful implications for the rest of the nation, AFL-CIO convention delegates were told.

Reuben Askew, first-term Democratic governor of Florida, told the convention of efforts to "shift a big chunk of the tax burden away from the wage-earner, the pensioner, the consumer and the homeowner and put it where it belongs—on those who can best afford it."

A first step was the vote Nov. 2 to amend the state constitution to allow corporate income taxes, Askew said. He hailed that vote as a sign that demagoguery has passed in Florida.

"People have sometimes allowed themselves to be used, manipulated fooled, frightened, divided and turned against themselves," Askew said, but that attitude is on the way out. He thanked the Florida AFL-CIO for its help in changing that political atmosphere.

Askew said the emerging progressive coalition has applications "which go beyond Florida and certainly beyond tax reform."

He urged organized labor to continue to reach beyond bread-and-butter bargaining issues, because "what good are wage increases if they're merely swallowed up in state and local consumer taxes and high prices for inferior products?"

Political leaders and labor alike could stand the improved image they would gain by getting behind anti-discrimination laws, representing low- and middle-income consumers before utility and regulatory commissions and joining the war on pollution "so that the good life you seek economically is not taken away environmentally," Askew said.

The governor cited a collective bargaining bill for public employes, dues check-off for state transportation workers and revival of the state mediation services as gains already made on issues of importance to labor and he pledged the continued efforts of his administration to achieve further advances.

Convention Draws Over 415 Newsmen

Bal Harbour, Fla.—More than 415 members of the press and news media covered the AFL-CIO convention.

The total included 13 television crews from the major networks and local stations, plus crews from three foreign countries.

A total of 340 reporters covered the convention full-time, and 76 reporters accompanied Pres. Nixon for his speaking engagement.

Western Union reported that approximately 210,000 words were filed by reporters.

AFL-CIO Stand Reaffirmed:

Peace Commitment Tied to U.S. Strength

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The commitment of the United States to world peace and freedom must be combined with adequate economic, moral and military strength, the AFL-CIO declared in a convention resolution.

In reaffirming the traditional position of American labor that the development of free trade union movements around the world depends heavily on U.S. aid, the convention said it is particularly important today that the United States remain steadfast in its international role.

"American disengagement from world responsibilities would today be more dangerous to freedom and peace than the 'Fortress America' policy ever was," the resolution said. "The coalition of fiscal reactionaries and rudderless liberals which recently defeated the foreign aid bill in the Senate reveals how grave the neo-isolationist menace has already become in our country."

In a separate resolution marking the anniversary of the Truman Doctrine of containment of communism, the convention recalled that a similar coalition of left and right assailed Pres. Truman when he first put forth the doctrine. The forces were led by Henry Wallace and Sen. Robert A. Taft at that time, it noted.

"The fact that there has been no world war for a longer period of time than that which intervened between World War I and II shows how correct Truman was and how wrong his critics and opponents were," the resolution said.

Appeasement policies, the resolution warned, cannot lower international tensions, nor establish a just and stable world peace. "American and allied unilateral concessions—without adequate Communist counter concessions — inevitably bring even more unjust Communist demands." This is a stark truth that the U.S. and its allies have not yet recognized.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, spoke against the resolution. But he stressed that "our differences reside primarily in the area of tactics," and do not stem from any feeling "that the AFL-CIO is not committed to the maintaining of freedom and peace throughout the world."

In other resolutions on international affairs, the convention:

- Called on the Nixon Administration to make a top priority effort to promote the transformation of NATO into a genuine partnership for maintaining peace and advancing human freedom and well-being.
- Voiced opposition to the Mansfield resolution for troop reductions in Europe, because such withdrawals would be "a grave threat to the security of the United States, the freedom of Europe and the security of the world."
- Urged creation of a special commission to study ways to revitalize the United Nations, with specific recommendations that Japan be given a seat on the Security Council and that the UN enforce its rule that member nations be expelled for non-payment of dues.

It was noted that Russia, Czechoslovakia and Poland are $130 million in arrears in dues and France is $22 million behind.

- Called on the federal government to "lose no further time in providing Israel with planes and other weapons it must have to maintain the balance of power, defend its national existence and preserve peace." The "unceasing flow" of Soviet arms and personnel to Arab states exacerbates the "danger of a serious clash of arms in the Middle East."
- Called on the government to do its utmost, through the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks and other international channels, to secure a gradual reduction in world armament and seek "the prohibition of all weapons of mass destruction through an effective system of manned, on-site, international inspection, supervision and control."

But the convention warned that "appeasement policies can never lead to reduced international tension, let alone to a just and stable world peace. American and allied unilateral concessions—without adequate Communist counter concessions—inevitably bring even more unjust Communist demands."

U.S. Assistance Urged For 43 African Nations

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Africa's richness in resources is exceeded only by the poverty and illiteracy of its people, the AFL-CIO convention noted in calling for full-scale U.S. assistance to Africa's 43 independent states.

The United States has a high stake in aiding a continent that has 20 percent unemployment, 92 percent illiteracy and a $150 per capita yearly production rate, a convention resolution noted.

Much of that could be alleviated, the convention said, by development of the vast resources of Africa, which already produces 98 percent of the world's diamonds, 65 percent of cobalt and 35 percent of the chromium.

And if the United States doesn't offer its assistance, "there will be serious danger of Moscow or Peking taking over by masquerading as supporters of freedom and self-determination," it was noted.

Some signs of progress are present, for despite 30 coups and counter-coups in Africa in the last 10 years, most of Africa is becoming nationally independent and free trade union movements are emerging in Nigeria, Dahomey, Uganda, Upper Volta and Togo, the convention said.

But in the areas where national independence is not emerging—as in the racist and colonialist regimes of South Africa and Portugal—the United States and its allies face a critical test, the convention noted.

Unless the western nations "are ready to re-examine and correct their position on national movements" in those countries, the resolution said, "the Free World will be doomed to a repetition of the Vietnamese experience." At the present level of South African armament, "this would lead to the genocidal crushing of 17 million South African blacks."

"A program of economic, political and social assistance would strengthen the new forces of Africa as well as bolster the forces of freedom and independence throughout the world," the convention said.

Ties to Labor Stressed:

Rights Focus Shifts To Economic Front

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"You can't take Title VII down to the grocery store," and black America consequently has got to move on from civil rights acts to economic gains, the AFL-CIO convention was told.

"Instead of the war on poverty, this nation's economic policies constitute a war on the poor," Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., declared in an address to the delegates, "and all the pious sermons about the dangers of inflation can't disguise that fact."

Jordan, the head of the United Negro College Fund who will soon be installed as executive director of the Urban League, said that while recognizable segments of the trade union movement have discriminated against Negroes, he refused to play into the hands of the real enemies of all working people by magnifying "the wrongdoings of a few unions."

Jordan traced the parallels in the history of the trade union and civil rights movements and said both were now moving into "the phase where expertise and sophisticated bargaining will replace marches and demonstrations."

He cautioned them that they'd better go together.

"In a multitude of areas, we both know that our mutual dependence is our mutual strength—divided we will succumb to our common enemies, those who dominate both black and white workers."

VERNON E. JORDAN, JR.

Jordan said black workers who are non-union in the construction trades are receiving 40 percent less pay. For the unions, "the large numbers of unorganized black construction tradesmen can ultimately mean more business for non-union contractors and the constant threat of dual unionism," Jordan said. And continued exclusion of blacks from unions serves as a ripe excuse for anti-union forces, he stressed.

A long-range threat is also posed by this large unorganized force, Jordan noted. Today, more and more white-collar technical jobs are being created with white workers getting them, he said, and "their place on the assembly lines and in the trades will be filled by black youngsters whose future commitment to trade unionism is directly dependent upon those unions' positive commitment to civil rights."

Jordan laid out a four-part challenge to the labor movement to initiate more organizing drives among low-paid workers of all colors, to develop and nurture black union leaders, to expand "your very valuable political education programs" into the black community and to break the zoning laws which form a "white suburban noose around the necks of increasingly black cities."

Reciting the successes and goals of labor and the civil rights communities in employment, housing, health care, and education, Jordan pledged continued cooperation from the Urban League in the AFL-CIO's Apprenticeship Outreach and similar programs.

Jordan received a standing ovation from the delegates, after which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pledged that he would have "the complete cooperation of every segment of the AFL-CIO" in his new position as head of the Urban League.

VISITORS FROM 55 nations, many of them top trade union leaders in their own countries, attended the AFL-CIO's ninth convention. As can be seen here, some came in colorful national dress.

Community Services Go 'Beyond the Plant Gate'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Since collective bargaining agreements can't cover every emergency a worker may face, the labor movement should maintain close ties with community agencies, the AFL-CIO convention said.

Citing the needs of union members and their families for food and shelter "caused by natural and man-made disasters such as hurricanes, floods, earthquakes, layoffs, strikes and riots," a convention resolution called for effective ties with community agencies that provide emergency services.

"It is a responsibility of the union to extend its services beyond the plant gate," the resolution said. And to make those services available, labor has to participate in developing all health and welfare resources in the community, it was noted.

In the process, the convention said such participation will "help make communities more representative of the people and more responsive to the people's needs" effective community and public relations for the trade union movement as a whole will be a valuable by-product of the effort, it was pointed out.

To accomplish this, the convention urged a labor role on the policy-making boards of agencies and in developing new facilities and services for social action.

In some instances, labor may have to set up its own community services agencies, the convention noted.

But in most cases, such agencies already exist and the goal can be accomplished through community services committees of AFL-CIO affiliates and the appointment of full-time community services directors, wherever possible, by international unions and state and local bodies, the convention said.

Federation to Pursue Latin Labor Links

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO will continue to strive for full cooperation with bona fide labor movements throughout the Americas, a convention resolution declared.

"The great mass of the Latin American peoples are still plagued by widespread social injustice, massive poverty, inadequate housing and educational opportunities and dictatorial military rule," the convention said.

While noting "numerous turbulent changes within the last two years," the convention said that democratic trade union movements in Argentina, Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador and Honduras "are making significant gains in terms of collective action to benefit their membership."

The AFL-CIO pledged to keep abreast of developments in Latin America, to maintain its affiliation with the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) and continue its efforts through the Inter-American Office and the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD).

"Latin American free labor and the AFL-CIO should be in the forefront" in fighting to preserve the Americas from Communist domination, the convention said, and it viewed some recent events with alarm. They are:

- The expanding relations between Chile's Allende regime with Communist powers.
- The continued delay in restoring constitutional government in Brazil.
- The destructive activities of guerrilla groups acting like Fascist bands and keeping Uruguay in a state of siege.
- Peru's unconstitutional and unrepresentative government, which has recognized and favored the Communist workers' federation.

J. P. Stevens Talks With TWUA Slated

Statesboro, Ga. — Negotiations between the Textile Workers Union of America and J. P. Stevens & Co. are expected to get under way shortly, following the Supreme Court's refusal to review a lower court decision ordering the textile company to bargain with the union.

The agreement by the Stevens Co. to bargain with the Textile Workers marks the first time the company has agreed to sit down with a union anywhere in the South.

Progress of Minorities Keyed to Jobs for All

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO will press its fight for cease and desist orders for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission as one of the additions needed to accomplish the goals of the historic civil rights legislation of the 1960s.

The convention noted, however, that full EEOC compliance and even the best manpower programs aren't going to help if there are no jobs.

"The full employment goal is a prime necessity for the continuation of minority group progress, for narrowing the gap between black and white and for bringing all citizens into the mainstream of American life," the convention said.

Voter registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns were urged as the route to full employment through the election of a President and Congress that would provide "well-paid and steady jobs, adequate education and decent housing as the foundation stones of a healthy and integrated society."

The convention endorsed legislation introduced by Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) to give the EEOC authority to issue cease and desist orders to employers or unions it finds in non-compliance with anti-discrimination laws.

The EEOC, created by the Civil Rights Act of 1964, has never had the authority to back up its rulings with the force of federal law enforcement.

But while pressing for full authority for the EEOC as well as full enforcement of the civil rights acts of 1964, 1965 and 1967, the convention noted that enforcement should be intelligent as well as vigorous.

"Misapplication of the intentions of the legislation, or the substituting of quotas and numbers games for sound affirmative programs can do a good deal of damage not only to unions, but to minority workers themselves," the convention said.

"The AFL-CIO urges all its affiliates to develop sound, affirmative action and manpower programs for expanding the opportunities for minority workers," the resolution said.

It called for full utilization of the services of the Human Resources Development Institute in working up manpower programs.

In get-out-the-vote drives, affiliated unions were urged to support the A. Philip Randolp Institute campaigns in the black community and COPE-backed campaigns in the Spanish-speaking communities.

Delegates Ask Reinstatement Of Foreign Aid

Bal Harbour, Fla. — Expressing dismay at the threatened collapse of the foreign aid program, the AFL-CIO convention called on Congress to re-instate it with immediate enactment of a 90-day continuing resolution.

The convention also re-affirmed the AFL-CIO policy calling for the United States to devote 1 percent of its gross national product to foreign aid.

Decrying the recent "short-sighted" action of the Senate in killing the foreign aid bill, the convention resolution said "our country cannot turn its back on the developing countries seeking economic progress and social justice."

The convention said aid from the United States is required to make such countries "less susceptible to pressures by expansionist powers and subversive movements supported by those powers." To rescind foreign aid, the AFL-CIO said, would be "a repudiation of the lessons isolationism taught us at so tragic a cost in the 1930s and 1940s."

Foreign aid helps underdeveloped countries become better customers for products turned out by American workers, the resolution said, and "military aid is needed to give developing nations a defense force which they could not mount with their own economic strength."

Government Employes Win Overtime Case

The U.S. Court of Claims has upheld the contention of the Government Employes that federal workers should be paid for overtime they work.

The court ruled that employes of the Veterans Administration Hospital in Augusta, Ga., were entitled to overtime pay for a period from 1960 to 1966 when they were required by the hospital to be on the job 25 minutes beyond their normal duty hours.

AFGE Pres. John F. Griner called the ruling a "breakthrough" and said "employes will now have a fairer chance at getting paid for the overtime they work."

RESOLUTION SUBMITTED to the convention is discussed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, left, Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks, and Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel. Abel served as chairman of the convention Resolutions Committee.

4 Democratic Senators Tear Into Nixon Record

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Four senators, all announced or presumed candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination, launched sharp attacks on the Nixon Administration in messages to the convention.

Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), who spoke to the delegates shortly after Nixon's appearance, termed the President's program "economic madness" that is not in the interests of workers or the country.

The other senators—Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) and Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.)—were prevented from appearing before the convention because of Senate votes on the labor-supported campaign funding bill. All three sent messages that were read to the convention.

McGovern told the delegates that the No. 1 national economic priority should be a decent job for every man and woman who wants to work.

Humphrey said in his message to the convention that Nixon had ignored an opportunity for bringing America together in his appearance before the AFL-CIO convention and chose instead to seek a confrontation "in the interest of personal, political gain."

If the President is for law and order, Humphrey said, then he should protect the sanctity of contracts. "To deny retroactive pay to workers who have a binding contract with management violates the basic principles of law and order," Humphrey said.

Jackson, who announced his candidacy during the convention, praised the AFL-CIO for "fighting on behalf of all workers—the unorganized as well as the organized, the small union member as well as the big union member."

In the days ahead, Jackson said, "the voice of the common man is going to be heard. It's going to be heard through the labor movement and on through the presidential campaign."

Muskie said Nixon has scored a number of devastating economic "firsts"—such as the first increase in unemployment since 1960 and the first increase in 10 years in the number of people living in poverty.

He said Nixon's first pronouncements as President paved the way for business to push prices to record levels when he said, "I do not go along with the suggestion that inflation can be controlled by exhorting labor and management to follow certain guidelines."

In his convention appearance, McGovern drew repeated and loud applause from the delegates when he spelled out a six-point plan starting with job creation and including an end to the exporting of jobs; government protection for workers directly affected by federal policies, as in aerospace cutbacks; adoption of an excess profits tax; respect for contracts, and exemption of low-wage workers from wage controls.

Central Bodies Role Stressed By Convention

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The "vital role" of state and local central labor bodies was stressed in a committee report adopted by the AFL-CIO convention.

It credited labor's central bodies with "remarkable accomplishments" in the political and legislative fields and strongly urged all AFL-CIO affiliates to extend their "support and cooperation."

The report by the convention's Committee on State & Local Central Bodies noted that longer sessions of state legislatures have added to the burdens and expense of labor councils. "As the problems of state and local governments increase, the role of the central bodies in helping to find solutions rises in direct proportion," the report noted.

In other areas, the report said that more than two-thirds of the state bodies have participated in summer school programs or utilized the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center.

It cited also "productive working relations" with the federation's Human Resources Development Institute and such groups as Frontlash and Senior Citizen councils.

A resolution adopted by the convention urged each AFL-CIO union to "conduct a thorough inventory" of the affiliation status of its local unions with the appropriate state and local central bodies. May 1, 1972, was set as the target date for completion of the survey and a report to the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

'Giveaway' to Business Hit:

Delegates Ask Tax Justice, Demand Action on Loopholes

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A strong call for tax justice was coupled with a sharp attack on "the Administration-proposed tax giveaways" in a major resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO convention.

Despite some improvements brought about by the 1969 Tax Reform Act, the convention said, "the tax structure is still full of loopholes of special privileges for wealthy people and corporations."

The resolution, adopted while the Administration's tax bill was being debated in the Senate, protested that the package of tax cuts and privileges for business sought by Pres. Nixon will deprive the nation of some $75 billion in revenues over this decade.

"They should be rejected," the convention declared.

It warned that "the so-called job development investment credit will create few, if any, jobs." That's the name the White House has given to its proposal to have the federal government subsidize a portion of all the purchases companies make for equipment by allowing them to deduct part of the price from their tax bill in addition to the normal deduction allowed for business expenses.

Likewise, the special depreciation rules the Administration wants to write into law after having put them into effect as a tax regulation would "completely destroy the concept of profits for tax purposes."

And as for the proposed Domestic International Sales Corporation "gimmick," the convention said this would allow corporations to defer taxes "perhaps indefinitely" on export income even though there is "no valid evidence" it would lead to increased exports.

The convention called for:

- Immediate enactment of an excess profits tax. "Such a tax should remain in effect during any period in which the wages of workers are subject to freezes, controls or restraints."
- Top priority to closing the capital gains tax loophole. "We believe that there cannot be tax justice so long as unearned income is half-taxed while earned income is taxed in full."
- Complete abolition of the special tax privileges of the oil, gas and other mineral industries.
- Ending tax exemption of interest from bonds issued by state and local governments. As an alternative, the resolution suggested, the federal government should guarantee the bonds and subsidize a part of the interest rates so that states and cities wouldn't be hurt by the change.
- Raising the minimum tax provisions which apply to income from "tax-sheltered sources" and which enable many wealthy people to pay a lower tax rate than workers whose earnings are taxed in full. At the same time, the convention said, the ceiling on taxation of the income of high-paid corporation executives should be eliminated.
- Enactment of new tax measures "to halt the export of U.S. jobs, remove the incentive to establish production and assembly facilities abroad, and create tax disincentives to curb expanded production abroad."
- Elimination of tax provisions "which contribute to the alarming trend of corporate mergers . . . and spur the growth of huge multinational corporations."
- A major overhaul of federal estate and gift taxes as "a prerequisite to the achievement of tax justice."

The convention resolution stressed that "elimination of these loopholes of special tax privilege for wealthy families and corporations would increase federal revenue by billions of additional dollars each year."

The additional revenue would meet the need for improved public facilities and services in the years ahead. And "it would also provide the basis for a reduction in the relative tax burdens of low- and middle-income taxpayers."

Finally, the convention urged, a continuing vigil is needed against such proposals as "the value-added tax, which is simply a national sales tax masquerading under a new name."

And it cautioned against "so-called business tax-incentive schemes" that "reward those who need it least, at the expense of those who need it most."

U. S. Standards Urged For Jobless, Injury Aid

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress was again urged by the AFL-CIO to establish federal benefit, coverage and eligibility standards for both unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation.

The convention reiterated labor's support for a full federal program with a single standard of nationwide benefits as a goal.

It urged enactment of federal minimum standards for state programs as a badly-needed first step.

On unemployment insurance, the resolution said that state benefit ceilings should be set high enough so that the great majority of covered workers would receive two-thirds of their lost pay during periods of unemployment.

It called for universal coverage—including domestic workers, farm workers, employes of nonprofit organizations and of state and local governments.

Federal standards, the convention said, should also apply to eligibility, duration, disqualifications and financing.

"Federal legislation should also be enacted to establish an extended benefit program on a continuing basis for long-term unemployed workers who have had a firm attachment to the labor force," the resolution declared.

On workmen's compensation, the convention endorsed a federal standards bill sponsored by Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), the chairman of the House Labor Committee.

Meanwhile, it urged, AFL-CIO affiliates should give increased support to efforts to improve state laws.

The benefit goal, as in unemployment insurance, should be not less than two-thirds of lost wages, and there should be no exclusions from coverage, the convention stressed.

The resolution also called on Congress to adopt needed amendments to the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers Compensation Act.

When the law was last amended 11 years ago, the resolution noted, it was "a pace-setter among state programs. Today, it is falling behind state programs in terms of worker protection."

'No-Strings' Handouts No Answer For Cities

Bal Harbour, Fla.—America's pressing problems won't be solved by turning federal funds over to states and cities with "no strings" on how the money is used, the AFL-CIO warned.

A convention resolution firmly rejected the Nixon Administration's revenue-sharing proposals. But it recognized that local and state governments have very real financial problems. And it suggested better methods of solving them.

As a starter, the AFL-CIO urged, existing federal grants-in-aid programs should be fully funded and the money that Congress appropriates should promptly be made available to cities and states.

More money is needed for such programs as education, manpower training, health, pollution control and other national priorities, the resolution stressed—and the federal government has an obligation both to furnish the money and to make sure that it is spent for the intended purpose.

"A huge financial burden" could be lifted from cities and states, the convention said, through "federal takeover of the costs of public welfare and the adoption of a program of national health security."

But states could do more than they have to provide revenue for public needs through an equitable tax structure, the resolution suggested.

"States must increase reliance on progressive income tax structures that are based on the principle of ability to pay. At the same time," the resolution urged, "efforts should be made to minimize the inequalities of sales and property taxes."

But when it comes to passing out federal funds, the AFL-CIO emphasized, Congress should decide the priorities, set the tax and spending policies necessary to achieve them—and retain the power of review and scrutiny.

Full Home Rule For D.C. Backed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The prospects for home rule for the District of Columbia are brighter now than for many years and all possible AFL-CIO assistance will be given to the drive for a final victory, the convention said.

It noted the approval of legislation creating a non-voting delegate and the earlier constitutional amendment granting the vote to district residents in presidential elections as indications that a final bid for full suffrage may be successful.

Geared to People's Needs:

U.S. Trade Policy Overhaul Pressed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—U.S. trade policies should be geared to the needs of the American people and not to the interests of foreign producers, multinational companies and banks, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

In calling for an overhaul of U.S. legislative, administrative and negotiating policies, the convention said there was a critical need "to prevent further displacement of U.S. production, market disruption, the export of American jobs and the erosion of the tax base."

The convention resolution said that Pres. Nixon's actions announced on Aug. 15 "do not deal with the major causes of the deterioration of America's position in international relationships."

The President's program was criticized for continuing loopholes in tax and tariff laws and incentives for foreign production.

"Proposed tax bonanzas to business in the name of encouraging exports—such as the Domestic International Sales Corporation (DISC)—would add to the tax burdens at home," the convention said.

Special low tariffs or preferences for imports from developing countries "distort the income and production structures of both developed and developing countries," in the modern era of managed economies and multinational companies, the convention said.

Instead of those devices, the convention called for legislation along the lines of the labor-endorsed bill recently introduced by Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.) and Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) that would:

- Give the President authority to regulate, supervise and control the outflows of U.S. capital and curb licensing and patent agreements.
- Set quotas on imports with exceptions and allowances for flexible growth.
- Establish a single agency to serve Congress in all trade matters.
- Provide for negotiation of international fair labor standards in all U.S. trade agreements.
- Require clear indication of the country of origin on all products, components and advertisements about them.
- Modernize and strengthen enforcement of anti-dumping statutes.
- Ease requirements for trade adjustment assistance allowances to make tests for injury more realistic and less complex, with authority over the allowance transferred to the Executive Branch.
- Impose federal standards on international accounting by U.S. firms with foreign operations.
- Require full disclosure on wages and hours paid by U.S. military and business abroad.

The resolution summarized the needed revisions as designed to stop "private greed at public expense."

In convention floor discussion, Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky called for the purchasing power of U.S. union members to be rallied behind America-made products through insistence on the union label, or else "our working conditions will be destroyed; our jobs will have disappeared."

INSURANCE WORKERS Pres. William A. Gillen takes a floor microphone to urge passage of a resolution backing his union's effort to win union shop agreements with the Metropolitan Life and Prudential companies in 1972 negotiations. The convention voted its support.

Unity Pledged For Insurance Union's Battle

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Insurance Workers are girding for a confrontation with two of the industry's biggest companies next year—Metropolitan Life and Prudential.

The issue is the union shop—of vital importance in a field with a heavy employment turnover and companies that have refused to agree to union security provisions.

The AFL-CIO and its other affiliates will be solidly behind them, the convention pledged.

Delegates listened to Insurance Workers Pres. William A. Gillen describe how each year his union must replace 25 percent of its total membership just to stay even. The task of completing the organization of the industry, he said, goes undone because the open shop situation "will keep us running forever in the same place."

The union, he affirmed, is determined to achieve union shop agreements in 1972 "and we are prepared to do whatever is necessary in order to accomplish that objective. We see it as necessary for us to be a viable organization."

Gillen asked the convention to call attention to the two big companies "the fact that the little Insurance Workers enter that battle not alone and unallied with friends, but with the support of the unions in the AFL-CIO behind us."

Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks then took a floor microphone to express "complete sympathy with the brother's speech" and strong support for the resolution.

The convention agreed and, without dissent, passed a resolution commending "this worthy trade union objective" and pledging to support the Insurance Workers "in its anticipated confrontation with the world's two largest insurance companies."

Labor Law Violations Spur Call for Change

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the AFL-CIO convention called for major changes in the National Labor Relations Act, along with improved and impartial administration of the law.

They noted with concern a decade-long increase in "brutal, discriminatory discharges for union activity."

"There are two reasons for this," the resolution stated. "One is that many employers, such as J. P. Stevens, simply have no shred of decency in their dealing with their employes. The other is that the act, as administered by the board and the courts, has in many cases become virtually useless."

The resolution proposed a number of amendments to the basic labor law to eliminate special preference given to employer complaints about unions—such as mandatory injunctions against alleged unfair practices by unions with no comparable provision for unions to obtain relief from employer unfair practices.

It said the board should have "more effective remedies," including the power to disqualify from federal government contracts employers who "deliberately and repeatedly" violate the labor law.

It proposed punitive damages against employers in cases of flagrant anti-union discrimination.

"In short," the convention said, the act should be amended to take the profit out of unfair labor practices.

The resolution reiterated labor's call for repeal of the "right-to-work" Section 14(b), and urged also changes in the Landrum-Griffin Act to eliminate "unwarranted restrictions on legitimate union activity."

The resolution stressed that "fair enforcement of the act calls for impartial board members and general counsel, not employer lawyers who serve a brief stint to augment their law practice."

In the main resolution as well as in others adopted by the convention, the AFL-CIO called for coverage under the federal labor law of presently-excluded groups "who most need union organization and collective bargaining." The list includes farm workers and employes of non-profit organizations.

The convention also proposed that plant guards be permitted to be represented by the same union that bargains for other workers at an establishment.

And it warned against "vicious proposals" in Congress to put unions under antitrust laws in order to "cripple the free American labor movement and to weaken collective bargaining."

State-County Contract Bars Political Firings

Harrisburg, Pa.—Political patronage has been wiped out for 17,500 members of the State, County & Municipal Employes in their contract with the state of Pennsylvania.

The contract, the first in Pennsylvania under a new public employe law passed in 1970, adds the words "or political affiliation" to a clause outlawing discrimination because of race, creed, color, sex or age.

After the highway workers' contract was signed, AFSCME won representation elections among two other groups of state employes, both in hospitals. In a 20,500-member unit of blue-collar hospital employes, the vote was 12,651 for AFSCME and 538 no union. The state hospitals' licensed practical nurses voted 321 for AFSCME and 130 for a local LPN association.

For the 17,500 highway maintenance employes of the state's Dept. of Transportation, the contract ends the state's age-old patronage system, under which highway jobs were dependent on the governor's election and employes were compelled to contribute to and work for candidates.

The new 18-month contract calls for four increases of 5 percent each. Other improvements include full-paid hospitalization for which workers previously paid an average of $30 a month, fully-paid life insurance of a year's salary, time and one-half pay after eight hours a day and other improvements in sick leave, holidays and grievance procedure.

The contract ended months of court battles over the patronage system. Some 2,500 workers were dismissed last spring, soon after AFSCME won a representation election in the group. Another 1,500 were dismissed in August.

An arbitrator ordered reinstatement with back pay for the 1,500 dismissed in August, but not for the previous group, since AFSCME had not been certified as bargaining agent at the time.

Delegates Back Law to Control Handgun Sales

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Strong federal legislation controlling the sale and ownership of handguns was urged in an AFL-CIO convention resolution.

Such legislation, the convention stressed, "poses no threat" to the many Americans "who use rifles or shotguns for sporting purposes."

Handgun control "represents the most direct route to reducing violent crime," the resolution asserted.

It noted that three-fourths of all policemen killed on duty over the past 10 years were slain by handguns—along with more than half of the nation's homicide victims.

As evidence that gun control works, the resolution cited the superior record of states and cities with stringent laws as against comparable areas without controls.

The 1968 Gun Control Act was a step forward, the convention declared, but its loopholes need to be closed.

FDR's Birthday Urged as Holiday

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called on Congress to proclaim January 30 a national holiday to mark the birth of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

The convention adopted a brief resolution citing Pres. Roosevelt's historic record and his contributions to securing a rightful place in society for working people, and voted to petition Congress to honor his memory with a national holiday.

HEW Hit on Attempted Public Health Cutbacks

Bal Harbour, Fla.—An attempt to transfer 200 doctors out of Public Health Service hospitals was strongly condemned by the AFL-CIO convention which urged Congress instead to appropriate additional funds for continued operation and maintenance of the PHS facilities.

The delegates called on Congress to pass a resolution immediately providing for the maintenance of present staff levels in the PHS hospitals and for the addition of new Public Health doctors to meet the needs of the Emergency Health Manpower Act.

The proposed transfer of the 200 physicians to the Emergency Health Manpower Program is only the latest tactic by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare to close the PHS hospitals "at a time when there is a greater need than ever before for such services."

The PHS system was established in 1798 to serve merchant seamen and was expanded to serve U.S. Coast Guardsmen and injured government workers. The hospitals also provided emergency services for the citizens of the major port cities where they are situated.

"They are health resources of the kind America has long been in short supply of and are virtually irreplaceable in a period of too little available medical care," the resolution noted.

Instead of dismantling the sorely needed PHS system, the convention urged the government to use "this great potential . . . for new and innovative types of delivery of hospital services and medical drug treatment . . . to the benefit of the primary beneficiaries of the PHS and for all Americans, through an expansion of PHS medical treatment and medical training facilities."

The Public Health Service, with the proper development, "could provide new guidance in the fields of drug addiction, hospital equipment testing, and many other areas where the private medical sector cannot meet the great demands being placed upon it," the delegates said.

In August, Congress reinstated the $14 million left out of the Administration's 1972 budget for operation of the PHS hospitals.

The House and the Senate passed resolutions calling for maintenance of the hospitals through 1972 and also urged that they be modernized.

Rail Nationalization Study Proposed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress was urged to establish a commission to make "an in-depth study" of the feasibility of nationalizing the railroads.

The AFL-CIO convention said a nationalized rail system should be considered because inept private management has "brought the deterioration of railroads beyond a nation's tolerance."

HRDI Role Is Stressed In Manpower Programs

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Manpower Administration's move to decentralize national manpower programs and the enactment of public service employment legislation will require an expanded role for the Human Resources Development Institute, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

The convention mandated HRDI "to offer technical assistance, upon request, to AFL-CIO affiliated unions at the local and state level in resolving problems arising in connection with the involvement of these unions in the public service employment program, authorized under the Emergency Employment Act."

Delegates urged HRDI to continue to make its services available to national and international unions in dealing with manpower problems.

Simultaneously, state and local central bodies were called upon to "take the necessary steps to achieve representation on state and local manpower planning bodies appointed by mayors and governors under the decentralization program, in the interest of meeting the manpower needs of the localities through well-conceived programs directed at existing jobs that meet established wage and work standards."

The AFL-CIO was urged to stimulate through HRDI the participation of organized labor in manpower training programs either as direct program sponsors or in cooperation with management.

The convention called on national and international unions for continued support of HRDI's Veterans' Assistance Program by urging cooperation on the part of their local unions.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council reported to the convention that the results of the veterans' program have been "surprisingly good" with central labor bodies placing veterans in jobs averaging about $3.06 an hour.

The convention urged HRDI to continue and expand its efforts in developing training programs for the disadvantaged and in assisting organized labor to participate fully and effectively in all phases of planning and program development.

This was the specific purpose for which HRDI was founded by the federation three years ago with the aid of a Labor Dept. grant.

Action Sought To Penalize Illegal Hiring

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Congress was urged by the AFL-CIO convention to legislate criminal penalties for employers who knowingly and willfully hire illegal immigrants, "thus robbing legal immigrants and American citizens of employment opportunities at decent wages."

The convention noted that the U.S. Immigration & Naturalization Service apprehended 317,000 illegal immigrants in 1970. It is estimated that the total number of illegal immigrants may be as great as 1 million.

"Because of their illegal status, these immigrants are easy subjects for blackmail, exploitation and intimidation by unscrupulous employers, who can turn the illegal immigrants into the authorities whenever they potest their sweatshop conditions," the resolution noted.

It urged Congress to provide additional funds to the Immigration & Naturalization Service for a more adequate staff to handle the agency's responsibilities, including more effective patrolling of the nation's borders.

A congressional study also was urged "to determine the economic and social impact of exploitation of illegal immigrants."

Local Gives Up 4-Day Week As Too Tiring

Kent, Wash.—A four-day, 40-hour week has been dropped at the Heath Tecna Corp. here because workers found the 10-hour shifts so tiring that efficiency dropped.

"Errors increased and production went down," said Ed Bernoski, business agent of Machinists Local 79 which represents the employes.

Bernoski said the union would not be averse to trying the four-day, 40-hour week again under a different operation, but noted that efficiency dropped during the final two or three hours of the shifts, especially during hot weather.

Some Machinists worked Monday through Thursday and others worked Tuesday through Friday of the week, giving them three-day weekends.

The shop would have minimal staffing Mondays and Fridays, sometimes making it difficult to get our pressing orders.

Shoe Workers Sue on Denial Of Import Aid

The United Shoe Workers have filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia challenging the U.S. Tariff Commission's interpretation of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 to deny relief to workers manufacturing shoe components.

At issue, USW Pres. George O. Fecteau said is a commission ruling that U.S. companies making component parts for shoes are not affected by the competition of imported shoes containing identical components.

The dispute stems from a petition filed by the union in July. It sought aid for workers at the Brown Counter Co. in Haverhill, Mass. The workers had lost their jobs, said the petition, because increases in shoe imports had reduced the market for American made shoes. The reduced market also cut the need for counters, one of the basic components of a shoe.

The commission "declined to accept" the petition because it did not regard imports of goods containing counters to be "directly competitive" with counters themselves. A motion for reconsideration was also subsequently denied.

The Tariff Commission interpretation, asserts the suit, "is a misunderstanding and misconstruction" of the law.

"Contrary to the commission's interpretation, adjustment assistance is available to parts production employes whether the part they make is being brought into the United States separately or as a component," the union declared.

It is seeking for a declaratory judgment rejecting the commission interpretation and requiring it to process the original petition for aid.

Fecteau noted that the outcome of the case would affect many industries besides shoes because subcontracting component parts is routine practice among manufacturers.

Adjustment assistance, which includes extended unemployment compensation, job re-training and other benefits, is provided by the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 for workers and companies damaged by the higher levels of imports resulting from the act.

Improvement Essential:

Lag in New Housing Tied to Nixon Policy

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO convention recommended that the national housing goal of 2.6 million units a year be reaffirmed and outlined the failure of the Nixon Administration to meet that goal as set forth in the Housing Act of 1968.

"During 1969 and 1970, housing starts were at an annual rate of 1.45 million units, including 770,000 mobile homes. The rate for these two years meant that America fell woefully short of meeting the shelter needs of her citizens," the convention declared.

"The last six months have shown some improvement in the annual rate of housing starts as funds not being used for commercial and industrial expansion shifted into housing. However, the current rate of 2 million units is still considerably short of the 2.6 million . . . goal."

The convention said the importance of housing cannot be minimized either from the standpoint of shelter or as a means of employment, and noted that the housing commitment in both the private and public sector must be bolstered if there is to be improvement in the economic health of the nation.

"To this end, there should be far more funds and far more emphasis placed on directing job-producing federal funds into housing and community development. These programs reap double benefits: jobs and community well-being," the delegates said.

The convention called specifically for:

- Construction of a minimum 1 million units a year for low- and moderate-income families.
- Establishment of metropolitan housing authorities that would represent a community-wide approach to a community-wide problem.
- Consolidation of major development programs into a single community development concept.
- Establishment of a federally funded urban development bank—Urbank—that would provide long-term loans to nonprofit quasi-governmental organizations receiving federal funds and pursuing the public policy in housing and related areas.

"However, we must recognize that all the legislation in the world is not going to do the job if the Executive Branch is not committed to implementing those laws," the convention noted.

"The pattern established by the Nixon Administration is long on rhetoric and short on performance, particularly in the housing field. Administration budget requests for housing and related urban programs are grossly inadequate."

Delegates urged immediate, further reductions in the FHA-VA allowable interest rate and an end to the policy of charging discounts to the consumer.

The cost of financing FHA has risen 356 percent in the past 20 years while the cost of land has shot up 296 percent.

"A national housing policy geared to meeting the needs of all Americans cannot tolerate a continuation of these inflationary pressures on the cost of shelter," the convention said.

It called for government discouragement of land speculation and a firm commitment to the Fair Housing Act of 1968, charging that such a commitment is lacking on the part of the Nixon Administration.

"We insist that affirmative government action be taken to overcome segregation in housing on the basis of race, creed, color, religion or economic status."

Union Support Urged For Mortgage Trust

Bal Harbour, Fla.—All international unions and state and local central bodies were urged by the AFL-CIO convention to participate "to the greatest extent feasible" in the federation's Mortgage Investment Trust.

The trust was organized in 1964 and has since become an attractive means of generating low- and moderate-income housing while receiving a yield competitive with other investments and maintaining a high degree of security.

The convention noted that since 1964, growth of the trust has proceeded at an increasingly rapid pace.

"In the past two years, the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust has grown from $6.7 million in participants' investments on July 1, 1969, to $24.6 million on July 1, 1971.

"Loans are made only to sponsors or developers of AFL-CIO union-built projects thereby creating additional union jobs through the investment of union monies. Participants have the privilege of earmarking their funds for projects in their areas if the investment is commensurate with the size of the requested project."

The convention emphasized that these are creative investments that add to the nation's inventory of housing, particularly low- and moderate-income housing.

"All these benefits are available in an open-ended trust that permits the participants to withdraw from the trust on 60 days written notice at the then current market price."

With private pension fund levels estimated at $136 billion in 1970, the convention made these other recommendations:

- That all trustees and managers of union general treasury funds and of labor-management pension and welfare funds examine all available investment alternatives carefully, considering the social benefits of each.
- That up to 30 percent of the reserves of union general treasury and pension funds be voluntarily invested in federally insured or guaranteed mortgages and construction loans.
- That international unions cooperate in placing information about the MIT before their affiliated locals and before trustees of pension funds.
- That governments explore new financing methods, using both public and private investment to bring new resources to bear on high priority urban needs.

White House in Tizzy:

Senate Ties Vote Fund Plan To Nixon Giveaway Tax Bill

urge the President to veto the entire tax bill if the campaign funding section stays in the final version. But if Nixon were to do so, it would mean abandonment—certainly for this year—of the business tax relief that is at the heart of his new economic policy.

After inclusion of an amendment aimed at lessening GOP opposition, the political funding section was approved by a majority made up of 50 Democrats and two Republicans, over the opposition of 42 Republicans and five southern Democrats.

If the House concurs—an event that House Republicans will fight hard to prevent—here's how the plan would work:

- A taxpayer filling out his return could direct that $1 of the federal income tax he pays be earmarked for the presidential campaign fund. He could either check a box for the money to go into a non-partisan fund available to all candidates, or he could write in the name of the party or nominee of his choice. If he does not do either, no part of his tax payment will go into a political fund. And whether he chooses to earmark a tax dollar or not, the amount of his income tax payment will be unchanged.
- Based on a formula of 15 cents for each person of voting age in the United States, a candidate who accepts money from the fund is limited to a total of $20.4 million—and would be barred by law from accepting any private contributions that would bring his campaign total above that amount.

The actual allocation formula is complicated. But if the fund comes up to expectations, the two major parties would be entitled to the maximum amount. For the 1972 election, George Wallace's American Independent Party would be eligible for up to $6.3 million based on his share of the vote in the previous presidential election. New parties which poll at least 5 percent of the vote would be entitled to reimbursement after the election for a proportionate share of the allocations.

- If a candidate chooses not to tap the fund, there is no restriction on the amount he can collect and spend from private contributions.

The political fund would be available only for expenditures after a candidate is nominated—not for primary expenses. Its use would be subject to whatever spending restrictions Congress may impose in other laws. For example, the Senate already has passed a bill limiting spending for political broadcasts, and similar measures are pending in the House.

Another tax provision dealing with political contributions was not opposed by Republicans, who are expected to profit from it somewhat more than Democrats.

This would allow either a modest tax credit or a larger tax deduction for a contribution to a political candidate, party or committee for use in either a primary or general election for local, state or federal office.

A taxpayer could claim against his tax bill 50 percent of contributions of up to $25 for a single taxpayer or $50 for a couple.

An alternative provision, more advantageous only for high-income taxpayers, would allow a deduction from taxable income of up to $50 for an individual or $100 for a couple.

The battle over political financing almost overshadowed the other sections of the tax bill, including these main provisions:

- An investment tax credit allowing business firms to subtract from their tax bill 7 percent of the cost of machinery and equipment—applying only to American-made products while the import surtax remains in effect, with presidential discretion thereafter. The Senate, however, added to the House-passed bill a 10 percent credit for investments designed to create jobs in areas with unemployment rates of 6 percent or above.
- An accelerated depreciation tax deduction for business, which labor had termed a "giveaway" that would deprive the government of needed revenue.
- Retroactive repeal of the 7 percent automobile excise tax and the 10 percent tax on light trucks. The Senate bill would allow the auto tax to be reimposed on cars imported from nations that discriminate against American-made autos.
- An increase in the personal income tax exemption from the present $650 to $675 this year and $800 in 1972—$50 more than the figure in the House bill.
- The "low-income deduction"—the amount any person may deduct from income without itemizing—is scheduled under present law to be $1,000 in 1972. The House had voted to raise the amount to $1,300, and the Senate then voted to make it effective this year. Coupled with the rise in personal exemptions, this would mean that in 1972, no federal income tax would be due from a family of four with earnings under $4,500.
- Taxpayers with higher incomes who do not itemize their deductions would benefit from a provision, effective in 1972, raising the standard deduction to 15 percent up to a maximum of $2,000. Present law allows a 13 percent deduction to a ceiling of $1,500. The House and Senate bills are the same.
- The Senate added an important child care amendment not in the House bill. It would allow deductions for the cost of child care up to $4,800 a year with no restriction on income when there is only one parent with responsibility for the child. For families with two parents, the full deduction would be allowed if the family income is under $18,000, with a declining deduction for higher incomes.
- Both the House and Senate bills provide a smaller tax loss than the Administration proposed on profits of exports sold through specially-created subsidiaries. The Senate bill would deny the tax break to profits that are invested in foreign plants and equipment.
- A new provision added by the Senate would allow a 20 percent tax credit to employers who hire welfare recipients through the Labor Dept.'s work incentive program.
- The Senate authorized the President to impose restrictions on imports when he decides that U.S. industry is threatened.
- Included in the Senate bill is a labor-supported extension of 26 weeks additional unemployment compensation in states with high unemployment.
- The Senate granted a tax credit of up to $325 a year on the first $1,500 of college costs.
- The Senate raised the existing ceiling on tax-exempt public bonds to finance new industry from $1 million to $5 million. Labor opposed this liberalization which could encourage runaway shops and plant piracy.
- A Senate amendment could give elderly couples with a combined income of less than $6,500 a tax credit of up to $300 on property taxes they pay. If they rent, 25 percent of the rent is treated as taxes.

Differences between the House and Senate versions of the bill must be resolved in conference, and then the final version must be approved by the House and Senate before going to the President's desk.

Local Affiliates Per Capita Tax Left to Council

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Proposals to change sections of the AFL-CIO Constitution dealing with directly affiliated local unions were shelved by the convention in favor of a less formal approach.

A resolution calling for a constitutional change expressed concern that per capita payments by directly affiliated locals might be less than the cost of services provided by the AFL-CIO and tend to discourage locals from affiliating with international unions that charge a higher per capita rate.

The convention's Constitution Committee saw no reason to rewrite the present constitutional provision which merely stipulates the minimum per capita rate for directly affiliated locals. Instead, it recommended that the AFL-CIO Executive Council act administratively to set per capita rates at a level "more consistent" with the costs of administering and servicing the locals.

It also recommended non-concurrence with a proposal to set a firm time limit for direct affiliates to come into international unions. The committee said the Executive Council should "reinforce its efforts" to encourage such affiliations. But it rejected the proposal for compulsion.

In both cases, the convention approved the Constitution Committee recommendations.

AFL-CIO Asks Rejection Of Agriculture Nominee

The Secretary of Agriculture should represent farmers, not big business, the AFL-CIO said.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller called on the Senate to reject Pres. Nixon's nomination of Dr. Earl Butz for the Cabinet post.

Biemiller cited the role of Butz as a leading spokesman for corporation farming as opposed to family farms, as a longtime foe of the food stamp program, as hostile to environmental protection and consumer interests.

In a letter sent to all senators, he said big business "already has too much domination of the Executive Branch" of government without adding the nation's farms to the list.

Price Index Edges Up, Workers' Pay Declines

Consumer prices edged up again in October while the take-home pay of workers declined—reflecting the greater clout that the wage-price freeze has on earnings than on prices.

The Consumer Price Index rose two-tenths of 1 percent, the same as in September, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. After seasonal adjustments, the October rise was one-tenth of 1 percent.

But the BLS also noted that real spendable earnings for a worker with three dependents dropped two-tenths of 1 percent. The average weekly take-home pay, based on 1967 dollars, was $92.14—down 16 cents from September.

Real spendable earnings for the typical worker were 2.8 percent higher than for October 1970, the BLS said. However, it also pointed out that the price index climbed 3.8 percent over the year.

Prices rose sharply for cars and wearing apparel last month, while the indexes for most food items declined.

The prices of new cars jumped 3.7 percent over the month, but used cars were selling for only one-tenth of 1 percent more, the BLS said.

Prices of women's and girls' clothes were 1.2 percent higher. Men's and boys' clothes rose eight-tenths of 1 percent.

Rent and homeownership costs also increased three-tenths of 1 percent last month, the BLS reported.

A two-tenths of 1 percent decline in the food price index was led by a three-tenths of 1 percent drop in grocery store items. Meat, poultry and fish prices were down six-tenths of 1 percent and fruits and vegetables dropped nine-tenths of 1 percent.

But the costs of food eaten away from home—restaurant meals and snacks—increased three-tenths of 1 percent. This was the smallest increase in this index in seven months, the BLS said.

The index for services rose two-tenths of 1 percent in October, somewhat below the increases of the five preceding months.

U. S. Urged to Bar Contracts To Scofflaws

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The federal government shouldn't do business with firms that "flagrantly, deliberately and repeatedly violate the National Labor Relations Act," the AFL-CIO said.

A convention resolution noted that some of the largest government contractors in the textile industry have been repeatedly found guilty of violating federal labor law and have made it clear that they have no intention in the future of recognizing the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively.

Presidential executive orders have barred government contracts from firms that discriminate in hiring or pollute the air, the resolution pointed out.

It called on Pres. Nixon to order a similar crackdown on employers who deliberately break the federal labor law.

Labor Affirms Stand on Sex Discrimination

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor's commitment to non-discrimination on the basis of sex was reaffirmed by the AFL-CIO convention.

"We seek to honor this commitment in collective bargaining agreements, in the conduct of union affairs and in legislative enactments," the delegates declared.

The convention continued AFL-CIO opposition to the equal rights amendments to the U.S. Constitution as being "ultimately more harmful than helpful to the legal rights of women."

"The labor movement seeks to be increasingly responsive to the needs and wishes of its women members, within the context of overall trade union objectives," the convention said.

"These include economic security for all workers, the extension of the minimum wage and other labor standards legislation, provision of day care centers, maternity leave and benefits, access to education and training, equal pay for equal work and elimination of discriminatory employment practices based on sex."

Delegates defeated a proposal that the convention urge consideration of female representation on the federation's Executive Council.

"The AFL-CIO cannot set qualifications for office on the basis of race, creed, color or sex," the convention said.

Political Stakes High:

'Total Commitment' Vital for '72 Victory

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The political stakes have never been higher than they are for the 1972 presidential election and a victory will come for organized labor "only with total commitment at all levels of the trade union movement," the AFL-CIO convention declared.

"There will be a strong possibility to support a winning presidential candidate and to elect a substantially more liberal House and Senate," the delegates said in a resolution.

"Such a combination could produce needed social legislation on the same scale as 1965-66, following the Johnson landslide."

The convention took pains to point out that the 1972 campaign begins now, with all-out cooperation with COPE, the AFL-CIO's political arm.

"All levels of the leadership and staff of the labor movement should make political action a priority from now to Election Day 1972," the resolution stressed.

It said activity must begin at once, "particularly at the local union level where members can be reached, educated and motivated, and persuaded to register and vote and contribute $2 to COPE."

At its pre-convention meeting, the federation's Executive Council approved a recommendation from the COPE Operating Committee to increase its voluntary contribution goal to $2 from each union member, instead of the $1 asked in previous years.

The main purpose of the increase is to meet skyrocketing campaign costs, which have tripled since 1956.

The AFL-CIO convention called for establishment of a COPE committee in every affiliated union, "charged with the responsibility of engaging every member possible in the democratic process."

Collection of COPE contributions was held vital to the '72 campaign, and the convention urged federation affiliates to ask every member for COPE dollars.

It called for an extra effort on the part of local unions, state and local central labor councils and international unions to involve the approximately 11 million youngsters in the 18-20 age group who will be eligible to vote in their first presidential election.

"Young members, and the voting-age offspring of union members, can bring tremendous new zeal and energy to our political programs," the convention said.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council had reported to the convention that most of the emphasis concerning the political impact of this new group of voters has centered on the college campus.

But as the council noted, that point of view overlooks the majority of the new potential voters who are not in school.

The council said Pres. Nixon will be "vulnerable" in the 1972 election because of continued high unemployment and high prices that the Administration's economic policies have fostered over the past two years.

But the council warned that any repeat of the 1968 Democratic infighting could sap the advantage that Democrats appear to have now.

Convention Endorses Free Public Transit

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Federal funds, public ownership and low fares were prescribed by the AFL-CIO to cure the deterioration of the nation's mass transit services.

In the most comprehensive resolution on the subject ever adopted at a federation convention, delegates also called on the U.S. Dept. of Transportation to finance and test in at least one metropolitan area a "no-fare" transit system.

Bus and subway service must be "convenient, economical, safe and comprehensive" if cities are to survive, the resolution warned.

High fares lead to increased use of private cars, with increased pollution and traffic-clogged streets. And, the resolution pointed out, reduction in patronage leads to reduction in service and still-higher fares to renew the cycle.

The convention resolution was submitted jointly by two unions that at times have been competitors—the Amalgamated Transit Union and the Transport Workers Union.

Only a publicly owned system "can concern itself with people rather than profit," the resolution said.

But even under public ownership, transit service will continue to decline "so long as the community relies solely upon the fare box to provide needed transit services."

The resolution pledged the AFL-CIO to:

- Support legislation providing subsidies from general tax revenues of local, state and federal governments for mass transit systems.

The goal would be to reduce fares and, if possible, eliminate them. It would put transit service on a par with other public services such as libraries, parks and schools.

- Seek public ownership of all private transit companies.
- Insist that in all legislation and programs existing employe and union rights and contracts be protected. Transit workers should also retain their full political rights when a private system goes under public owership.
- Seek a large-scale test of a system that does not charge fares to patrons.

The resolution stressed the importance of "a reasonable alternative to the private use of automobiles."

A transit system of the nature contemplated by the resolution could link "the ghetto worker with the suburban job."

It could lead to reduced welfare costs, make recreation centers available to larger numbers of people, avoid displacing homes with more and more urban highways, and stabilize cities, the resolution asserted.

The "vicious cycle" of reduced patronage and higher fares reduces employment opportunity for transit workers at the same time that it reduces transportation service for the public, the resolution noted.

It warned that the situation has already deteriorated to the point that less than 25 percent of the travel within the nation's urban areas is by means of public transportation.

Shorter Hours Seen as Path To More Jobs

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Shorter work schedules would mean more jobs at a time America desperately needs more jobs, the AFL-CIO convention pointed out.

A decrease in the hours of work, whether on a daily, weekly or annual basis, was urged by the convention as an aid in curbing the widespread unemployment caused by national economic stagnation, automation, import-related plant closings and the return of servicemen from Vietnam.

But the convention specifically opposed all plans to extend the number of hours in the workday. "If Congress wishes to alter the current workday-workweek standards, such changes should include an eventual reduction in the standard workweek to four days of eight hours," the convention said.

It noted that the U.S. Dept. of Labor has held hearings on exemptions to the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act to allow the 10-hour day under some government contracts. "We are not so naive as to believe that the initiation of the four-day, 40-hour, no-overtime pay arrangement in the area of government contracts would not lead to its quick application throughout the work force," the convention said.

In another resolution, the convention said that a decrease in hours worked, with no reduction in wages or benefits, would both increase efficiency and provide great social gains. Every available study has shown increases in productivity, morale and attendance when the work schedule is shortened, it was pointed out.

11-27-71

'Bold New Approach' Urged in Social Security

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO proposed a "bold new approach" to improving social security benefits—and a new means to help finance the program.

A convention resolution said social security beneficiaries need "more than sporadic, stopgap and piecemeal legislation to deal with their economic plight."

It proposed, instead, "a comprehensive reform on all fronts to lift the burden of poverty" from retired and disabled workers so that they can spend their remaining years "in comfort, security and dignity."

The cost of future improvements in benefits should be met in part by payments from general tax revenues into the Social Security Trust Fund, the resolution urged. At present, the program is financed by a payroll tax levied on workers and their employers.

The resolution reiterated the key provisions of the social security legislation sought by the AFL-CIO:

- A first-stage 15 percent across-the-board increase in benefits in 1972, followed by an additional 20 percent increase in 1973.
- An increase in the minimum benefit to at least $100 a month, with a higher minimum for workers with many years of service.
- A raise in the wage base on which social security taxes are levied to at least $15,000. The resolution said this would restore the situation that existed in the early years of the program when the taxable wage base covered the full earnings of the overwhelming majority of Americans.

A higher taxable wage base would also mean that higher-paid workers would receive bigger pensions when they retire and their dependents would have more protection—in return for the higher payments they would have to make into the fund. To keep the wage base from again becoming outdated, the resolution said, it should be adjusted from time to time "in line with increases in wage levels."

- A reduction in the waiting period for disability benefits to one month. The convention said also that "older people who are below retirement age but who are not totally disabled" should be eligible for benefits "if they are unable to engage in their usual occupations."

Government Attacks On Press Assailed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Keep the government out of the newsrooms and broadcasting studios, the AFL-CIO convention said.

It expressed "grave concern" over governmental attacks and encroachment on broadcasters and newspapers.

A free press and broadcasting system "is a measure of a free society," a convention resolution affirmed, "and anything that weakens it weakens all the liberties Americans enjoy."

Chemical Union's Boyle Asks Unity

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The labor movement "can no longer stand the luxury of fragmentation, we must unite," Chemical Workers Pres. Thomas E. Boyle told the ninth convention.

In a brief address marking the return of the Chemical Workers to the federation, Boyle said "if we have any differences, if we have any fights, let us have them in our own house."

Boyle thanked the federation's top officers and presidents of affiliated unions for helping prevent potential raids on the Chemical Workers, singling out for particular attention Machinists Pres. Floyd Smith.

Opposition to Rehnquist Reaffirmed by Delegates

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor's opposition to the appointment of William H. Rehnquist to the Supreme Court was strongly reaffirmed by delegates to the AFL-CIO Convention.

"Political extremism of the right and the left has no place on the Supreme Court," the convention said in calling on the Senate to reject the nomination.

The resolution challenged Pres. Nixon's description of Rehnquist as a "strict constructionist."

Rehnquist's record, writings and statements all indicate that "he is a strict constructionist of the Constitution prior to the adoption of the Bill of Rights."

The convention resolution noted Rehnquist's evasiveness at Senate hearings as to his views "on such constitutional questions as wiretapping, executive power and civil liberties."

It said the American people have the right to know whether Rehnquist is "more loyal to a President than to the Constitution" and whether, on the Supreme Court, he would "respect individual liberties more than executive power."

Pres. Nixon has repeatedly tried to pack the Supreme Court with reactionaries, the convention charged.

"The Senate properly rejected his nominations of Clement Haynsworth and G. Harrold Carswell," the resolution noted.

"It must do so again . . . The future of today's citizens, their children and their grandchildren, is too important to permit a man of Mr. Rehnquist's philsosophy to exert his influence over the constitutional direction of American society for the remainder of this century."

Senate Votes Retroactivity, Bars Delay in Federal Pay

New Veto Threats Hurled:

Nixon-Congress Conflict Sharpens

Conflict between Congress and the Nixon Administration sharpened as the White House hurled new veto threats in an effort to flag down legislation that would force Pres. Nixon to choose between swallowing programs he doesn't want or abandoning his own legislative priorities.

The heaviest White House attack was levied at the Senate-passed tax bill. But Administration officials were also working to scuttle a comprehensive child care program for working mothers that has been passed by both the House and Senate.

In both cases, Congress used Administration bills as a vehicle for its own legislative initiatives.

In the case of the tax bill, a House-Senate Conference committee bowed to most of the White Houes objections. The revenue portions of the final version of the bill deviate only slightly from the House measure that the President had deemed acceptable.

But the conferees refused to give in completely to the President's demand that they scrap the Senate-approved plan to finance presidential campaigns by allowing each taxpayer to allocate $1 of his tax payment to a special campaign fund.

In a final effort to avoid a veto, they agreed to put off the first use of the fund until the 1976 election. This would leave the Republicans with a big financial advantage in the 1972 election—both because the party traditionally has received the lion's share of big contributions from wealthy businessmen and be-

Court Order Winds Down Dock Strike

New York—Nearly 45,000 striking Longshoremen began heading back to work last week in 13 ports from Maine to Mexico after Pres. Nixon invoked his emergency powers under the Taft-Hartley Act.

The Administration obtained a federal court injunction ordering the men back to work for a "cooling off" period of 80 days during which further negotiations are to take place.

But a spokesman for ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason said no new talks had been scheduled with representatives of the shipping industry, and that the two sides were as far apart as ever on basic issues.

A major stumbling block involved management's demands for modification of the guaranteed annual income provisions in the Port of New York—the nation's largest—where more than

Aging Parley Backs Health Security Plan

By Tom Castor

The White House Conference on Aging, called by Pres. Nixon himself, went on record as favoring National Health Security and major improvements in the social security program—two proposals long urged by the AFL-CIO.

"The White House Conference on Aging has produced some important resolutions which, if implemented, would not only greatly improve the lives of the elderly, but bring benefit to the entire nation," said AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman.

Seidman and nearly 100 other representatives of organized labor were delegates to the five-day conference, explaining and arguing labor's position on socially relevant measures among the 3,500 delegates from across the country.

The delegates were divided into 14 sections which formulated public policy recommendations on the aging. The individual recommendations of these sections became the conference recommendations.

The labor representatives worked closely with a number of organizations involved with the social problems of the elderly as well as groups such as the National Council of Senior Citizens, the Urban League and the National Caucus of Black Aged.

Labor was particularly active in the income section of the conference, which produced the recommendations on National Health Security and social security.

"Priority consideration should be given to the establishment of a

White House Goes Along 'Reluctantly'

By David L. Perlman

The Senate voted to overrule the Pay Board and allow workers to collect retroactively most wage increases that were denied them during the 90-day freeze period.

It also, by a near-unanimous vote, agreed to give federal employes the bulk of their comparability increases on Jan. 1—as originally scheduled. Pres. Nixon had ordered the salary increases postponed until next July so that government workers would "set an example" to the rest of the country.

Both labor-supported provisions were added to the Administration bill extending the President's economic stablization powers an additional year. The amended bill was approved, 86-4.

The House Banking Committee, meanwhile, completed action on a companion bill. It has a retroactivity provision similar, although not identical, to that adopted by the Senate.

So strong was the Senate sentiment for retroactivity on frozen pay hikes and equal treatment for federal workers that the Administration caved in without a fight.

Word was sent to the Senate through the chairman and ranking Republican member of the Senate Banking Committee that the President would reluctantly accept the retroactivity and federal pay provisions.

The Senate committee had written into the economic stabilization bill authorization for payment of frozen wage increases in amounts

Nixon at the AFL-CIO—An Eye-Witness Account

Ed Townsend, labor correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor, covered the recent AFL-CIO convention. His eyewitness report on Pres. Nixon's visit to the convention, the delegates' reaction to his speech and the subsequent moves by the White House to "manage" the news appeared in the Dec. 1, 1971 edition of the Monitor under the headline "Labor Convention Rift in Retrospect." This is what he wrote.

Pres. Nixon may prove to be the strongest single unifying force for American labor in years. The union movement thrives on causes—and the President's appearance at the recent AFL-CIO convention has developed into one.

Delegates who attended the convention in Florida are convinced by what happened there that the President and his Administration now are committed to wage war on labor.

When the convention opened Nov. 18, many AFL-CIO affiliates were not too unhappy with Phase 2 controls—they had won substantially what they wanted except for the retroactive payment of raises that were due but withheld during the Aug. 16-Nov. 14 freeze.

By the end of the convention, the attitude had changed. More than anything else this was a result of exaggerated reports of the

Treasurer Nominee's Hiring Practices Hit

The AFL-CIO voiced "vigorous opposition" to the appointment of Mrs. Romana Banuelos as Treasurer of the United States and called on the Senate to reject the nomination.

William L. Kircher, the federation's organizing director, said Mrs. Banuelos has repeatedly shown contempt for the nation's laws by hiring large numbers of illegal border-crossers from Mexico to work in her food processing plant near Los Angeles.

The effect, Kircher told the Senate Finance Committee, was to deprive Mexican-Americans legally in the United States of job opportunities and to discourage union organization because illegal aliens are under constant threat of being turned in for deportation if they displease their employers.

Kircher also submitted to the committee a telegram from Cesar Chavez, director of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, denouncing the nomination and terming it "unthinkable" that Congress would approve the appointment of "any person en-

KEYNOTE ADDRESS to the eighth convention of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries was delivered by Pres. Francis S. Filbey of the Postal Workers. Mrs. Maggie Reimann, left, served as convention chairman.

Auxiliaries Set Sights On '72 Election Drive

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries vowed to wage an across-the-back-fence political campaign in 1972 and took steps during the eighth convention here to insure a broader political action program.

"There is no better time than now for the auxiliaries to organize women . . . so that we can effect a change in 1972," Sec.-Treas. Novella Porter told the 84 delegates representing 15 affiliates with a combined membership of 32,000.

To help pay for expanded programs in political action and organizing, delegates voted an increase in per capita payments to $1 per year from all international and national union auxiliaries as well as directly affiliated auxiliaries. The annual payments had been 12 cents and 36 cents respectively.

Mrs. Porter was re-elected secretary-treasurer, a post she has held since 1967, and four vice presidents were returned to office:

Mrs. Maggie Reimann, Postal Workers, chairman of the executive board; Mrs. Viola Moss, Bookbinders; Mr. Lela Cornett, Steelworkers, and Mrs. Rosine McLemore, Sleeping Car Porters.

New vice presidents elected were Mrs. Marlene Donahue, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Mrs. Shirley Olson, IBEW, and Mrs. Mary Lusk, Glass Bottle Blowers.

Mrs. Marcella Beatty serves as executive director of the auxiliaries.

Mrs. Porter said that increased emphasis will be put on educating newly franchised voters and getting the union apprentice's wife into the auxiliaries program.

A man is apt to be a more active union member "if his wife belongs to an auxiliary," she declared.

In addition to political action, delegates pledged continued support of union label and union boycott programs, noting that union wives spend 90 percent of the union-earned dollar.

First prize in a drawing to defray convention expenses was won by the Poplar Bluff, Mo., AFL-CIO.

Signalmen Pact Ratified, Sent To Pay Board

Chicago—Members of the Brotherhood of Railway Signalmen "overwhelmingly" ratified a contract which provides a 46 percent wage and fringe benefit increase over 42 months—retroactive to Jan. 1, 1970.

More than 26 percent of the package already has gone into effect, including a 13.5 percent increase ordered by Congress last May when it sent the striking Signalmen back to work for more than four months.

But the Pay Board must pass on 5 percent raises due next Jan. 1, Apr. 1, Oct. 1 and the following Apr. 1 for nearly 13,000 workers.

The Pay Board decided to postpone that decision Nov. 29, ordering the Signalmen and the Association of American Railroads to provide additional information on their contract agreements.

The 20-percent increase over the next 18 months exceeds the 5.5 percent annual guideline of pay increases set by the Pay Board, but still is below the more than 15 percent annual increases the board allowed 80,000 coal miners.

Almost all of the remaining 600,000 rail workers have similar contractural raises coming up between now and the middle of 1973. The Signalmen's settlement is considered a "test case" that probably would set the pattern for the other rail unions.

Robert Wilson Named Labor Board Solicitor

Robert J. Wilson, associate chief counsel on the staff of a National Labor Relations Board member, has been named solicitor of the NLRB. He succeeds Eugene S. Goslee, who became one of six new trial examiners appointed by the Labor Board.

City Mirrors Industry's Woes:

Steel Layoffs Transform Gary Into Economic Disaster Area

By Mike Bosch

Gary, Ind.—High unemployment and big layoffs have become increasingly commonplace throughout the nation, but until recently they were not matters of immediate concern to the people of Gary.

After all, Gary is a steel town and steel is at the center of the American economy. Joblessness and layoffs were something that happened at other plants, in other communities.

Suddenly the people of Gary, and those in many other steel producing centers around the country, are learning what it means to be laid off and what continuing high unemployment can do to a city.

The jobless rates and totals vary in the different sections of steel country, but they are all much higher than the norm.

It was expected here that even if there were no steel strikes this year, some sort of layoffs would occur. But there had been an abundance of overtime in the period leading up to Aug. 1—the contract expiration date—and few workers minded the prospect of a brief vacation from the sweltering steel mills.

When they came, however, the volume of the layoffs hit the community like a sledgehammer. The president of Steelworkers Local 1010, Jesse Arredondo, said he received a phone call from a newspaper reporter at 3 a.m. the day he returned from the steel negotiations in Washington asking for a comment on the massive layoff that was coming the next day at his plant. Arredondo said he didn't know anything about it but, "when I got to the union hall in the morning I found I had only 3,200 people working out of a membership of 18,000."

Cases like this were reported everywhere that steel is made across the country. Additional thousands of steelworkers were laid off in Pittsburgh, Youngstown, and in the Buffalo area.

But Gary's almost total dependence on steel left the city particularly hard-hit. Its unemployment rate ranges from 30 to 41 percent, depending on whether you accept the figures offered by the Indiana State Employment Service or Mayor Richard G. Hatcher.

Whatever the figures are, says Hatcher, there is no denying the "fact that Gary is in a crisis employment situation."

Official statistics list a little over 25,000 unemployed in the entire three-city metropolitan area of Gary, Hammond and East Chicago, even though Gary alone has more than 25,000 applications for unemployment insurance benefits.

In the past, Gary has seldom had to worry about work for its citizens, as the demand for steelworkers more often than not outstripped the local supply of labor.

The downtown section of the city, just a few blocks from the gates of the mills, had always been packed with shoppers. Today, the streets are almost deserted. The stores are empty and the shopkeepers, feeling the effect of a ruptured economy, are laying off their employes in ever increasing numbers.

City officials claim that each job in the steel mills generates one and one-half jobs in the community. They fear that these jobs will not return to the local economy until long after the mills are back to normal.

"With the type of ethics that the people of Gary have," said one city official, "when they do go back to work they'll pay all their back bills before they ever think about any new buying, and it will take months before the rest of the community gets back on its feet."

One shopkeeper on Broadway, Gary's main street, replied with an obscenity when asked how business was. When pressed to suggest a solution for Gary's woes, he said, "make those smoke stacks blow their beautiful, dirty smoke again."

Beyond the complaints of those who want work but can't find it, there is a curious reluctance to talk about the causes, effects and solutions of the city's unemployment problems.

Local newspapers, after an initial spurt of reporting on the situation, now print very little about unemployment. "We're trying to play down the layoffs because its bad for advertising," one newspaper employe said.

And U.S. Steel, the largest single employer locally, is not helping matters. Even though food stamp offices have been set up in area union halls to facilitate aid to the needy, the job has been made difficult by the company's refusal to disclose how many workers it has laid off or who they are.

Without U.S. Steel's cooperation, unemployment figures take weeks to compile and are instantly obsolete because as workers are called back in one department, they are laid off in another.

Union leaders in the area estimate that of 70,000 Steelworkers normally employed, about 20,000 are out of work.

U.S. Steel also refuses to disclose at what percentage of capacity it is operating.

"Orders during August were spotty and increased to the level of 'depressed' during September and have stayed on a plateau since then," was the only comment a company spokesman would make when questioned about the mill operating levels.

Another U.S. Steel official added that if orders don't improve shortly, "we are considering curtailing operation" even further during the "last two weeks of December."

Adding to the steel industry woes is a huge cutback in orders, from Detroit. Despite an upturn in auto sales, the auto makers, who normally account for about 20 percent of the total steel sales, are continuing to draw on stockpiles they had built up in anticipation of the steel strike that never occurred.

Steel officials now say they "don't see" a return to normal operations on the near horizon and express hope that it will be "by the end of the first quarter."

In the meantime, the people of Gary are running out of food and money.

Local welfare officials say food stamp outlays have risen $500,000 a month with long lines of additional applicants being processed every day.

Because of additional strains placed on their budgets, welfare officials have had to cut off allotments for rent payments and other services to welfare recipients because as Township Trustee Dozier Allen put it, "Food comes first; everything else is being put aside to see that no one goes hungry."

Allen charges that the Nixon Administration could help Gary, but refuses to do so.

"I've asked the Secretary of Agriculture to lower the price of food stamps, but I was turned down," he said.

Mayor Hatcher, along with steel company, union, Chamber of Commerce and community representatives, recently journeyed to Washington to ask for federal help. But the group received little in the way of assurances and even less in the way of immediate help.

Even the small amount of aid they are eligible to receive has been caught up in a hopelessly mired sea of politics between the Republican-controlled state and national governments and solidly Democratic Gary.

Gary officials point out that Indianapolis, with a Republican mayor and 5,000 fewer unemployed, initially received more than five times as much as Gary in Emergency Employment Act funds.

After strong protests and a survey conducted by volunteers which proved that 41 percent of the people in Gary who wanted work could not find it, the city received another $939,000 in aid. The total amount is still less than Indianapolis received.

Gary has asked the federal government to declare it an economic disaster area.

"No matter how the President says his freeze measures will help," asserts Hatcher, "it's going to take a while—and we need help now."

Bars Federal Pay Delay:

Senate Approves Retroactive Boosts

that are not "unreasonably inconsistent" with the wage guidelines announced by the Pay Board on Nov. 8—generally 5.5 percent, with consideration for inequities and substandard conditions.

The language is similar to the proposal made last month by labor members of the Pay Board—and rejected by a 10-5 majority made up of the public and management members.

It would order retroactive payment "of any wage or salary increase (including any insurance or other fringe benefit offered in connection with an employment contract) which (a) was agreed to in an employment contract executed prior to Aug. 15, 1971, (b) was scheduled to take effect prior to Nov. 14, 1971" and which was not paid because of the freeze "unless the President determines that the increase provided in such contract is unreasonably inconsistent with the standard for wage and salary increases" that have been set for wage increases generally.

Although the Senate voted on dozens of amendments during its consideration of the bill, no senator sought to eliminate the retroactivity provision.

The federal employe pay provision was added as an amendment from the floor—adopted by a 77-1 vote.

It marked a complete turnabout since early October when the Senate and House both refused to overturn Nixon's six-month postponement of pay increases based on comparability with private industry jobs. At that time, before the Phase 2 wage policy was known the Senate vote was 51-32 to uphold the President

If the House should follow the Senate's lead, the pay raise federal employes would receive in January could not exceed the 5.5 percent wage guideline. That would leave them slightly under the estimated comparability level of about 6 percent.

The legislation does not directly affect the government's blue-collar workers, whose wages are based on area prevailing rates. Nixon earlier ordered their wage adjustments postponed six months as well, an action not subject to congressional review.

But senators during the debate firmly established "legislative history" that it is the intent of Congress that blue-collar workers receive their prevailing rate increases, subject only to the general 5.5 percent ceiling.

The Senate also voted to require confirmation of the full-time chairmen of the Pay Board and Price Commission, although allowing a 60-day grace period in office to the present chairmen while confirmation action is pending.

It specifically excluded from wage controls workers with "substandard earnings," including all persons whose wages on an annual basis would be less than the government-defined poverty level for a family of four.

And it voted 50-36 for an amendment exempting from all wage and price controls the newspaper, magazine, book, and broadcasting industries. Supporters of the exemption argued that it was a needed safeguard against "economic censorship" by the government of unfriendly news media.

It also voted unanimously to exclude from Pay Board controls pension, insurance and health-welfare benefits affecting units of fewer than 1,000 workers.

On prices and rents, the Senate authorized courts to award a plaintiff punitive damages as well as attorney fees for deliberate overcharges. The award could be either a flat amount from $100 to $1,000 or three times the amount of the overcharge.

The Senate rejected, however, an amendment that would have exempted state and local governments and their employes from wage controls. The vote was 56-36.

And it turned down amendments that would have shortened the extension of the President's economic stabilization powers which will expire at the end of April under existing law.

Among the miscellany of amendments offered was one by Sen. Robert Taft, Jr. (R-Ohio) that would have rewritten the nation's labor laws. It included the "final offer selection" form of compulsory arbitration proposed by the Administration for transportation industries, but would have made it applicable to all industries. It also incorporated portions of bills proposed by three senators.

The Senate quickly disposed of that effort by voting, 58-29, to table the Taft amendment.

A 20-POINT AGREEMENT covering bargaining rights for AFL-CIO community affairs representatives working for United Way organizations is signed in Bal Harbour, Fla. From left are William Aramony, national executive, and Bayard Ewing, board chairman of United Way; AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee, and Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services.

Pay Board, Price Panel Issue Series of Rulings

The Pay Board and Price Commission—the two economic control agencies for Phase 2—issued a series of rulings on individual cases as they relate to the 5.5 percent guideline on average annual wage increases and the 2.5 percent guideline on price boosts.

Both agencies issued a series of ground rules for Phase 2. The Pay Board adopted a policy on merit raises and other income issues, and the Price Commission said that large regulated utilities will need its permission as well as that of federal and state agencies to raise their rates.

But there was no movement on what organized labor considers the main issue—retroactive payment of wage increases frozen during Phase 1, although the board exempted workers earning less than $2 an hour from the rule against retroactivity.

The Pay Board invited an appearance by Prof. John Dunlop, chairman of the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee which has allowed 400 retroactive pay boosts out of 500 pacts reviewed since the freeze ended.

By a 10-3 vote, the Pay Board allowed a 15 percent rise in the first year of a contract between the United Mine Workers and the Bituminous Coal Operators Association. The majority pointed out that nearly a third of the amount is to increase welfare fund benefits which were due long before the freeze took effect.

The Pay Board has postponed a decision on parts of a 46 percent wage and fringe benefit package negotiated by the Brotherhood of Railroad Signalmen retroactive to Jan. 1, 1970. Twenty-six percent of the increase already has gone into effect, but the Pay Board will rule on the remaining 20 percent and asked both parties to the contract for additional information.

On merit increases, the Pay Board ruled that they are subject to the 5.5 percent guideline where there is no contract.

But where there is a contract, the rate range for merit increases may be carried forward into a new contract negotiated after the freeze expired without the merit pay being counted towards the 5.5 percent guide.

Thus if a new contract retained the old merit range of say $200 to $250 a month, increases within that range would not count against the 5.5 percent. But if the range were increased to $225 to $275, any merit increment in that range would be subject to the guideline.

The Pay Board delegated to the Internal Revenue Service the initial decision as to whether an individual is entitled to retroactive pay increases under the board's regulations, but included a right of appeal to the board itself.

The Price Commission said that public utilities with operating revenues of $50 million or more, which includes nearly all major utilities, must file rate increase requests with the commission.

The commission said it had received 339 price increase requests from 291 major firms since Nov. 14.

Notable exceptions to the 2.5 percent guideline were approval of a 7.2 percent increase for Bethlehem Steel Co.'s price of tinplate products, and a 7.2 percent price increase for the National Steel Co.

The board also approved price increases for all major auto producers, the highest being granted to the Chrysler Corp. for a 4.5 percent on 1972 automobiles. The company had asked for an increase of 5.2 percent.

Meanwhile, Pres. Nixon appointed a 14-man Rent Advisory Board to be headed by Thomas B. Curtis, vice president and general counsel of the Encyclopaedia Brittannica and a former congressman from Missouri.

Pact Defines Labor's Role In United Way

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A memorandum of understanding reached between the AFL-CIO and the United Way of America spells out the mechanics of labor's participation in the activities of the national community fund-raising organization.

It also opens the way for formal collective bargaining on the wages and working conditions of AFL-CIO community affairs representatives assigned to United Way and declares the right of all employes of voluntary community agencies to union representation.

United Way is made up of local United Givers, Community Chest and similar organizations.

The 20-point memorandum was signed for the AFL-CIO by Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, chairman of the Executive Council's Community Services Committee, and Leo Perlis, director of the federation's Dept. of Community Services. Signing for United Way were Bayard Ewing, chairman of the board of governors, and William Aramony, national executive.

The memorandum provides for AFL-CIO representation among United Way officers and two seats on the executive committee. It also provides for a director of the UWA Labor Participation Dept., to be nominated by the AFL-CIO, as well as at least six AFL-CIO community services representatives, four to be assigned to regional UWA offices and more to be added as additional offices are developed.

The parties agreed to work together to develop and train AFL-CIO community affairs representatives assigned to full-time work in regional, state and local United Way organizations and to orient all United Way staff members in labor policies and programs.

The memorandum declares the UWA's belief "that voluntary community health and welfare agencies, including United Way of America, should respect the right of their employes to join organizations of their own choosing for collective bargaining and grievance purposes."

Longshoremen Returning to Docks Under Taft-Hartley Act Injunction

80 cargo-laden vessels were tied up as a result of the two-month strike which began Oct. 1.

A presidential emergency board appointed by Nixon reported that there was no agreement, either, on seven other issues the ILA is seeking to negotiate in a master contract covering the Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports.

These included wages, hours, pensions, welfare, length of contracts, cargo containerment and the use of aboard-ship hauling.

New York-New Jersey dockers were returning to work under the terms of their expired contracts which guarantee them pay for 2,080 hours of work annually—at base pay of $4.60 an hour—whether they work that many hours or not.

In some ports, reporting Longshoremen found that the docks weren't ready for their return after the 59-day walkout.

Stevedoring firms apparently had not had time to establish and post work schedules, and unloading equipment, which had not been maintained during the strike, had to be serviced. In the Port of New York, Longshoremen spent their first days back at work unloading and loading baggage from passenger lines.

James O. Langston, director of the New York Waterfront Commission's longshore hiring centers, said it was the "slowest recovery from a strike" he had ever seen.

It was the second time in seven weeks that the government had invoked Taft-Hartley provisions against longshoremen.

On Oct. 6, back-to-work orders were issued against the unaffiliated Longshoremen & Warehousemen after a strike by that union closed West Coast ports for more than three months.

In seeking to enjoin the Atlantic and Gulf Coast strikes government lawyers presented affidavits by Cabinet members charging that the longshore strikes threatened public health and safety.

Paul W. McCracken, outgoing chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, said continuation of the strike would "weaken the ability of the United States to pursue its national security objectives in the world and to maintain prosperity in the domestic economy."

Meany Making Good Progress

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was making "excellent progress" at George Washington Memorial Hospital in Washington, his doctors reported.

All medical tests are normal, they said, adding that Meany was resting quite comfortably.

Care and Feeding of a Myth

THE NEWS MEDIA of America have created a new myth—that the recent AFL-CIO convention treated Pres. Nixon discourteously—and the White House has displayed all of its Madison Avenue skill in demonstrating how to care for and feed a myth and turn it into a monstrosity.

The White House shooting script was simple and "perfectly clear." It involved having the President show up at the AFL-CIO convention—after delaying a reply to an invitation to speak for seven weeks—with a "gutsy" well-rehearsed, off-the-cuff speech that would draw an unpleasant reaction from the delegates—maybe even a few boos and jeers.

The President executed his role well except for some nervousness during his speech when he momentarily made Vice Pres. Agnew the President and a few other slips when expected applause lines bombed.

But the delegates didn't cooperate. They didn't boo or jeer. They were polite and cool and unimpressed. Here's how one reporter on the scene. Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. reported the incident:

"Getting a clear picture of the Nixon visit to the convention is getting more and more difficult as the White House builds up pressure on the media to play up the 'abuse' theme.

"Some reporters who covered the convention and strove to write unbiased stories report that their editors had received White House calls urging that the 'abuse' theme be played and replayed.

"All three television networks received similar White House calls. The New York Times reports that ABC news executive Av Westin received three calls 'from a White House official, whose name he would not disclose, shortly after the President left the convention hall. . .'

"With few exceptions, convention reporters from all media were startled by the reports on maltreatment of Nixon. They emanated mostly from White House correspondents. The reception was icy but polite. The only jeering that took place came from the far-left Progressive Labor Party picketing the Americana Hotel and the convention."

CONN'S REPORT NOTES that "almost all reporters covering the convention say that the discourtesy charge is not only an exaggeration but a myth."

A delegate at the convention arose the next day and, mentioning the media reports on the Nixon visit said, "I very frankly wonder if I was even here." He voiced the concern and disbelief of all the delegates and their guests.

Media people know that it takes a long, long time, if ever, for an answer to catch up with a charge, for the truth to catch up with a malicious lie, for the facts to catch up with and explode a myth.

But we urgently suggest that this time around the media take another look and correct the record so that it shows in George Meany's words that "we respect the office (the presidency), we respect the man that holds the office, and we are going to continue to do that. However, this doesn't mean that we have got to be subservient to the man who holds the office."

A Word Edgewise:

McCarthy's 'Crusade' Ascribed To Boredom and Injured Pride

By John P. Roche

EUGENE McCARTHY'S behavior in 1967-68, and his subsequent performance, left a number of his devoted associates utterly baffled, if not disillusioned. Why would he turn over his seat on the Foreign Relations Committee to a "hawk" like Gale McGee? Why, indeed, would be simply quit the Senate, deserting one of the most useful forums in the country? On the other side of the Hill, long-time McCarthy watchers were equally puzzled because the notably lethargic senator, who had been one of Lyndon Johnson's pocket votes when the latter was Senate majority leader, was out leading a "crusade." What in God's name had gotten into him?

While I have no claim to intimacy with Eugene McCarthy, I followed him closely long before he hit the limelight. He was easily the wittiest man in Washington, and after two or three conversations—in which he would invariably turn his mordant rapier on the operations of the Senate—one began to ask "Why is he in the Senate?"

An extremely intelligent man, bored to death, is a potential tornado. The classic example was Theodore Roosevelt, who in 1912 split the Republican Party largely because he had nothing better to do with his time and talents.

John Kennedy once referred to Congress as a "zoo," but he was willing to put in his time (tempered by extraordinary absenteeism) because to him the Senate was a launching pad for the presidency. McCarthy was in a curious way nonpolitical.

A Minnesota congressman tells the story that in 1958, McCarthy came to his district—which had fearful unemployment—and gave a marvelous, philosophical speech. When the meeting ended, the women were wiping tears from their eyes, saying what a grand talk that was, and demanding when the congressman and Sen. Humphrey were going to do something about unemployment! McCarthy had a special dispensation from mundane political chores.

Then came 1964 and what must have been the trauma of a lifetime. Suddenly it seemed as though there might be relief from the boredom of the Senate: the vice presidency.

Lyndon Johnson let it be known that McCarthy was at the very top of his short list. McCarthy gathered an organization at the convention in Atlantic City, and even published a most attractive brochure, which featured a photo of Johnson with his arm around McCarthy and a presidential quote that Gene was a man "to go to the well with." Right down to the wire, McCarthy was kept in suspense.

NOW IT HAPPENED that Pres. Johnson had long since selected Hubert Humphrey, but he wanted some tension at the convention and he was convinced that if he told the exuberant HHH, even in strictest confidence, the word would be all over town in five minutes.

"He wouldn't have told them," the President once said to me, "but they would have taken one look at that grin on his face and headed for the phones." So Johnson played cat and mouse with Eugene McCarthy and by doing so created a mortal enemy. McCarthy is a proud Irishman; one does not use his ego as a football. Like Pat Moynihan, who got similar treatment in the imbroglio over the Negro family, McCarthy would have supported Benedict Arnold for President to beat Lyndon Johnson.

Much of the confusion about McCarthy's campaign arose from a failure to realize that he was not waging ideological warfare. All the whooping and jumping left him cold: he was not a messiah, he was off on a blood feud. If the "kids" got disillusioned, that was their problem; he had never pandered to their illusions in the first place. And Johnson's exit on March 21, 1968, took much of the steam out of his campaign. After all, nobody can really hate Hubert Humphrey.

So here it is, 1971, less than a year before another election and McCarthy is prowling around the margin: still bored, still sharp and witty. But with no enemy. It remains to be seen how far boredom alone can activate him, though one suspects that he will remain on the sidelines shooting darts at all the players.

Looking to '72:

New Crop of Young Voters Poses Election Uncertainties

(The following is excerpted from an article by COPE Research Director Mary Goddard Zon in the November American Federationist, monthly magazine of the AFL-CIO.)

TWENTY-FIVE MILLION PEOPLE between the ages of 18 and 24 who will be eligible to vote in their first presidential election on Nov. 7, 1972, are now the subject of intense study, speculation and a spate of carefully hedged predictions.

The sheer size of this year's body of new potential voters fascinates election watchers. That is about the total number of votes cast for FDR in each of his four elections, and 6.5 million more than the total for all candidates when Woodrow Wilson was elected in 1916.

Politicians in both parties mull over a more recent statistic: a switch of 225,000 votes from Richard Nixon to Hubert Humphrey in 1968 in the three key states of Illinois, California and Ohio would have elected Humphrey. In 1972 there will be 10 times that number, or 2.3 million newly eligible voters among the 18- to 20-year-olds in those three states.

Elaborate charts and maps have been drawn comparing the number of new voters with voting pluralities in recent presidential, congressional and gubernatorial races and projecting the possible impact of the new voters on the outcome of the 1972 elections.

The impact could, of course, be enormous if a sufficient number of that 25 million is added to the pot of 73 million voting for President in 1968 and if they come down in significant numbers on one side or the other. Even if those conditions are not met, the impact could be decisive in a close election when any group can justly claim a decisive role. But most current interest centers on discovering who these young people are and guessing how many of them will vote and how they will vote.

Of the 25 million, 13.9 million would have been eligible to vote in 1972 even if the voting age had not been lowered, and 11.1 million were enfranchised in July 1971 when ratification of the 26th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution lowered the voting age to 18.

Nearly 8 million are now in college—3.9 million among those who will be 21 by election day and 4 million in the younger group. That is an important fact, and its most important aspect may be that it means that almost 18 million, two-thirds of the total, are not college students. They are jobholders, job-seekers, housewives, members of the armed forces and high school students.

Even though the great majority of young people has had no college experience, the general level of education has risen dramatically in recent years. In 1970, for the first time, the average voter was a high school graduate. While about one out of four (23.7 percent) aged 21-24 had one or more years of college experience in 1960, nearly two out of five (37.5 percent) had at least one year of college in 1970.

In 1970, over half (55.2 percent) of the population aged 25 and older finished high school, while 80.5 percent of those aged 20-24 had high school diplomas. The general rise in scholastic attainment can be expected to continue and to figure prominently in predictions of expected voter turnout.

The theorists betting on a big youth vote in 1972 discount the experience in four states. Alaska, Georgia, Hawaii and Kentucky, where voters under 21 were enfranchised before ratification of the 26th Amendment. In 1968, fewer than 40 percent of the under-21 potential in those states actually voted. Nationally, only 52 percent of the first-time presidential voters between 21 and 24 actually voted, compared to a 62 percent national average.

Since these two groups—those under 21 in four states and those 21-24 nationally—share almost the same educational experience as the current crop of new voters, various theories are advanced to explain their poor 1968 turnout. None is as persuasive, however, as the notion that voting is an acquired habit.

CENSUS FIGURES for the past two presidential elections show voter participation rising in stages to peak at those aged 45-65 before beginning to drop. The 65- to 75-year-olds still vote more heavily than 25- to 34-year-olds and a higher proportion of those over 75 still make it to the polls than do those in the 21- to 24-year-old group. Blacks and Chicanos have been discouraged from acquiring the voting habit by mobility and other factors. There are low voter turnouts even among middle-income, educated whites in the District of Columbia, where the right to vote is relatively new.

In summary, young voters seem to be somewhat more likely to vote than earlier first-time voters, somewhat more liberal than the general electorate and somewhat less inclined to accept a party label.

Like the women who preceded them into the voting lists, a great many will share the political goals of other voters of the same economic and social experience—if not those of their own parents, those of somebody's parents.

Most issues that concern them are not peculiar to their age or to their generation.

They are not immune to the appeal of style and appearance.

And if they like attention, and who doesn't, they are going to have an awfully good time in the next 12 months.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE POWER TO TAX is the power to destroy. This is an aphorism that is frequently cited by powerful economic interests whenever they feel that the federal government or the states are taking too much money out of their pockets through taxation.

What these same economic interests rarely note is that the power to tax also is the power to determine who shall be poor and who shall be rich as they devise and get adopted all sorts of tax "loopholes" for themselves.

In the long run, it is Congress that decides who gets taxed and how much, but it is unprecedented for a President of the United States to take upon himself the power to redistribute the national wealth as he sees fit.

Yet, Pres. Nixon has done just that. By executive fiat he has taken tens of millions of dollars out of the pockets of workers and put those same millions into the pockets of their employers without even taking the trouble to explain how this can be an equitable act.

We have, then, the spectacle of the leading Republican of the nation—wedded to the concept of the rights of property—destroying those same rights by the stroke of a pen.

For the contracts made by many unions in voluntary agreement with their employers for wage increases to become due on specific dates represent property rights no less "sacred" than the property rights represented by huge factories in major cities or "No Trespassing" signs on country farms.

What happens to the money that should have been paid to thousands of workers but that was never paid because of the President's 90-day freeze?

Obviously, if the Pay Board continues to insist that retroactivity be denied except in special cases, we shall continue to have the economic injustice that monies agreed to be paid out will never be paid but will remain in the pockets of those who agreed to pay them.

What is inexplicable about the quarrel over retroactivity is the unctuous rebukes that so many Administration spokesmen and editorial writers have visited on labor's head because labor has had the audacity to ask that it be paid what is due it.

THE PECULIAR LOGIC of the Administration in denying to workers the use of this same money that is to be given to industry has a parallel in its treatment of wages and dividends. Wage increases are to be limited to 5.5 percent; in a spirit of presumed equity, dividend increases are to be limited to an even lower rate of 4 percent.

Yet, the fallacy to the claim of "equal sacrifice" has been completely exposed in the Wall Street Journal, surely the most influential voice of business in the nation. Discussing this concept of "equity," the Journal notes:

"Suppose a company's profits are rising so that it might think of raising its dividend. Because of controls, it instead re-invests the added profits into the business, increasing the company's value and no doubt the price of its stock.

"Rather than getting increased dividends, then, the stockholder has stock that is worth more. If he chooses, he can sell some or all of the stock and, if he has held it six months or more, pay taxes on his profit at capital-gains rates, which are likely to be lower than the taxes on dividends or other ordinary income."

The Wall Street Journal rather piously observes that under a controlled economy "absolute equity becomes an absolute impossibility."

American workers are not used to getting "absolute equity," but the American press would do well to examine more closely than it has the inequity of Phase 2 before chastising the American labor movement as it is now doing.

Federal Involvement Pressed:

Workers, Employers Benefit From Child Day Care Centers

EMPLOYERS are beginning to realize the advantage of quality child day care services for their workers, but they still balk at spending the money it takes for full-range facilities, a union social projects expert declared.

Joyce Miller, social services director of the Chicago Joint Board of the Clothing Workers, said that the union's pilot day care centers in Chicago and Baltimore have demonstrated that "people work better when their minds are at ease, knowing that their children are well taken care of." She said that employers find it "easier to hire people," and that absenteeism and turnover decline.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference. Mrs. Miller stressed that the growing demand and need for quality day care cannot be met by voluntary efforts alone, and urged approval of the federal Comprehensive Child Development Act proposed by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.). She praised the thrust of the Mondale bill as toward "the needs of children, rather than just the need to get mothers out of poverty and put people to work."

She scored the charge of conservatives that the Mondale proposal would be a "child control act." She said the "danger of the federal government controlling our children through the day care system" is no more real "than in Medicare . . . the public school system . . . or any other governmental program."

Mrs. Miller said that despite such detractors, there is growing recognition of the need for readily available, full-range child care facilities, at a cost that mothers who must work "to put groceries on the table" can afford. She said that more and more unions are becoming interested in "day care programs for their membership," with facilities placed in either the neighborhoods where the workers live or "in the factories."

She also pointed out that state and local governments are becoming more active in the day care field, noting that the state of Illinois now operates 36 centers in housing projects, and the city of Chicago recently created a Dept. of Day Care.

FULL-RANGE DAY CARE at rates working mothers can afford helps employers hire and hold more stable and efficient employes, Joyce Miller, center, director of social services of the Clothing Workers Chicago Joint Board, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning her were Robert Barr of Fairchild publications and Ruth Jordan of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO public service interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Insurance Industry Practices Cited As Cause in Soaring Health Costs

Much of the blame for escalating medical care costs must be borne by the health insurance industry, which has grown into a $12-billion-a-year business, an article in the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine charges.

The coverage of commercial health insurance policies is slanted toward in-hospital services—"the most expensive type of medical care," writes Allen Y. Zack in the November issue of the Federationist.

The record of the commercial health insurers and the non-profit Blue Cross plans with their emphasis on hospitalization—rather than preventive care—has been brought out by numerous witnesses in congressional hearings, Zack notes.

He cites the testimony of a Florida hospital director, who said: "Insurance companies have done very little to curb the health care price rise, in fact, they do a great many things to cause costs to rise. It's easier to raise the premium and blame and the doctors and hospital for the rising cost."

Zack also points out that hospital utilization studies "consistently show that Blue Cross patients tend to remain hospitalized three to four excessive days."

All insurance companies, Zack contends, "share the blame for leading policies in favor of hospital care—and the payment practices of the non-profit Blue Cross plan sometimes fail to lead to the best medical care."

The article refers to several examples cited by congressional witnesses showing that often more costly hospital operations were performed instead of less costly and at times less risky alternatives that could be done in a doctor's office.

The result, Zack observes, is that "the unsuspecting patient has been made to feel that care outside the hospital is second rate. This is a major factor in escalating medical costs."

Although Blue Cross plans pay a lower hospital rate than other commercial insurers that operate for a profit, the Blues are asking for huge premium increases across the country and attempting to cut back on coverage, Zack reports. Several instances are cited:

- In 1969, Blue Cross of New York City asked the state for a 44.8 percent increase for one type of contract. An even bigger boost was approved for 52.6 percent.
- Massachusetts Blue Cross filed for a 33 percent increase last May, less than six months after it was granted a 15 percent hike.
- In Philadelphia, it sought to drop an out-patient program on the charge that patients abused it. But it failed to note that patients could get into the facility only on the order of a doctor.
- Connecticut subscribers were notified they could select a program of lesser benefits rather than accept higher rates.

Zack also points out that in terms of dollars most of the Blue Cross business comes from government money, not private contracts.

"In addition to its regular business, Blue Cross administers the Federal Employes Health Benefits program, medical benefits for military dependents, most of Medicare and, in 20 states, Medicaid."

Other forms of commercial health insurance are analyzed in the article, including the "junk" policies that pay a flat rate to the patient during his stay in the hospital.

"These policies, frequently advertised in newspaper supplements, are notorious high profit-makers for the insurance companies. The ratio of payments to premiums is the lowest of any form of medical insurance—less than 50 percent."

The amount the commercial insurance companies pay their subscribers for these policies usually falls short of meeting the patient's hospital costs, Zack reports.

"Despite this record, the insurance companies are queuing up at the Capitol in hopes of convincing Congress that national health insurance must be given to private insurers," Zack notes.

He points out that Blue Cross already has undertaken a lobbying campaign to convince key decision-makers "that only through Blue Cross can truly effective and efficient provision be made for financing the health care of the nation."

Education a Key Factor In Family Income Level

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Education remains a crucial factor in the income level of both poor and affluent families in America, University of Michigan economists report.

The 1970 Survey of Consumer Finances, published by the University's Survey Research Center, reveals that among families with incomes of $25,000 or more, 69 percent of the family heads had at least some college training.

In contrast, among families with incomes of less than $3,000, 65 percent of the heads had less than a high school education.

The report also noted that educational attainment is strongly related to both past and expected income increases. Realized and expected income increases in 1969-70 were reported more than twice as often by family heads with a college degree than by those with eight grades or less of education.

The survey report also deals with installment debt, housing, automobile purchasing, household appliances, vacations, financial assets, ownership of stocks and long-range attitudes of the American consumer.

Highlights of the survey include:

- Installment debt—Just under half of all American families had outstanding installment debt in the first part of 1970, a small decrease from the 51 percent of the year before. The decrease was confined to the less affluent families.
- Credit cards—Fifty percent of all families report the use of at least one credit card, including 78 percent of families with incomes over $15,000.
- Housing—During the last 20 years home ownership has become increasingly common, especially in the upper-income groups. Nonwhites have increased their home ownership at a faster rate than whites, although only 40 percent of nonwhite families owned their homes in 1970 compared to almost 67 percent of white families.
- Automobiles—Expenditures for automobiles continue to rise, although much of the increase can be attributed to increased prices and the buying of more options.
- Vacations—Sixty-two percent of families earning more than $15,000 took a vacation in 1969, compared to 21 percent of the families earning less than $3,000 and 39 percent of the families earning between $7,500 and $10,000 a year.
- Financial assets—The proportion of families holding no liquid assets reached a low of 16 percent in 1970, while the proportion holding more than $5,000 reached a high of 21 percent. Close to two-thirds of all families now have a savings account with a median holding of $1,300.
- Stock ownership — Families owning stock reached a high of 26 percent in 1970.

System Short of Needs:

Myths on Welfare Exploded by HEW

By John R. Oravec

Charges continue to crop up that the nation's welfare rolls are made up of loafers, cheats, illegitimate children and mainly blacks who refuse work. The charges are more myth than truth.

These misconceptions proliferate without regard for the facts, the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare declares in a new pamphlet.

The purpose of the pamphlet is to explode many of the popular myths that have emanated from many sources, particularly conservative politicians, as the welfare rolls climbed to the highest level in history.

During the same time, unemployment has also risen sharply. And the disadvantaged, the under-employed and the "new poor"—including many white-collar and technical workers who had held secure jobs—are now on public assistance.

John D. Twiname, administrator of the HEW Social & Rehabilitation Service, observes in introducing the pamphlet that the misconceptions not only malign the victims of poverty, but also the social workers who strive "to make the present inadequate welfare system work."

One of the major myths coming from welfare critics is that many persons on public assistance are able-bodied unemployed males.

The fact is, HEW points out, that fewer than 1 percent of the 13 million Americans on federal-state welfare programs are employable males. And about 80 percent of those want to work, according to a government sponsored study. About half of the men already are in work training programs.

The largest group on welfare—55.5 percent—is composed of children. Another 18.6 percent are mothers with no male in the family, and about 14 percent of the welfare mothers work while another 7 percent are in work training.

Elderly persons make up 15.6 percent of the welfare rolls. The remaining 9.4 percent are blind and disabled persons.

The charge that welfare families are loaded with children is another unfounded myth, HEW says.

The average welfare family has a mother and three children. Most of the children are two years old or older. Since the typical welfare family receives assistance for about two years, HEW points out that most of the welfare children were born or conceived before the family applied for public assistance.

Another myth, that most welfare families are black, is also untrue, HEW stresses. The largest racial group—49 percent—is white. Negroes represent about 46 percent of the welfare families and the other 5 percent is from other racial groups.

Contrary to often-made charges that cheating on welfare is widespread, the government pamphlet says it is actually almost non-existent.

"Suspected incidents of fraud or misrepresentation among welfare recipients occur in less than four-tenths of 1 percent of the total caseload in the nation, according to all available evidence," the pamphlet says.

The length of time a family remains on welfare is much shorter than most critics contend. The facts show that the typical welfare family has been on public assistance for 23 months.

The myth that welfare recipients would rather stay on public assistance rather than work also is unfounded when the level of payments is taken into account, HEW says.

Average payments vary from state-to-state, ranging from a low of $60 a month in Mississippi to $375 in Alaska. In all but four states, the payments have been below the established poverty level of $331 a month. Most states pay less than their own established standard of need.

Another myth: "Give them more money and they'll spend it on drink and big cars." But a government survey found that welfare families would use the extra money for needed essentials, mainly food, clothing and housing.

Besides subsistence, welfare agencies provide other needed services for the poor. These include health care advice and referrals, counseling on financial and home management and employment.

To meet the many needs of the poor, the recent AFL-CIO convention called for "genuine welfare reform." It urged a $600 increase in the proposed basic family assistance program to $3,000 a year.

It also stressed that no welfare recipient should be referred to a job that pays a sub-standard wage, nor should a welfare mother be referred to work without adequate child care services for her children.

Conference on Aging Endorses Health Security, Income Floor

comprehensive National Health Security program which would include the aged as well as the rest of the population," the conference said.

"Financing the program solely through wage and payroll taxes and contributions from general government revenues would insure that health care expenses would be a shared responsibility of the government, employers and individuals. There should be no deductibles, co-payments or co-insurance."

Seidman pointed out that the conference recommendation conformed specifically to the language of the Kennedy-Griffiths National Health Security bill now before Congress.

The conference declared that until such a comprehensive health system is established, "the benefits of Medicare-Medicaid should be increased immediately to include, at a minimum, out-of-hospital drugs, care of the eyes, ears, teeth and feet—including eye glasses, hearing aids, dentures, etc."

The conference also called for "improved services for long-term care and expanded and broadened services in the home and other alternatives" to institutionalizing patients.

It is the federal government, the proposal noted, that "must assume responsibility for assuring an adequate supply of health manpower and essential facilities and for improving the organization and delivery of health services."

On social security, the conference called for a minimum standard of income adequacy for elderly couples. The report from the income section set that minimum at $4,500 a year—the Bureau of Labor Statistics' "intermediate" budget for an elderly couple in the spring of 1970.

"This level must be adjusted annually for changes in both the cost of living and rising national standards of living," the conference said.

"For single individuals, the minimum annual total income should be sufficient to maintain the same standard of living for couples, or not less than 75 percent of the couple's budget."

"The economic situation of the elderly, if past experience is repeated, will improve more slowly than that of younger groups even with an upturn in the national economy," the conference recommendation noted.

"Immediate action to increase the income of the elderly is urgent and imperative."

Again, the government was called upon to make sure the program works as the conference proposed, that "the basic floor of income for older people should be provided through a combination of payments from the social security system and payments from general tax revenues."

Such a financing program has been urged repeatedly by organized labor.

In addition, the conference said, "there should be a supplementary payment system based on an income test to bring incomes up to the minimum, financed entirely from federal government general revenues and included in a single check from the Social Security Administration.

"The financing of the social security system should include a contribution from general revenue and the whole structure of payroll taxes should be reviewed to lighten this burden on low-income workers."

The conference urged the federal government to encourage broadened pension coverage under private pension plans and called on state and local governments to remit part of the elderly's property taxes.

A Reporter Who Was There Saw Nixon Greeted 'Politely' But Cooly

AFL-CIO delegates' "crude and insulting" treatment of the President. The White House and top Administration aides apparently had encouraged such reports, in labor's view.

Debate will go on for a long time as to just what happened at the convention. Boos and jeers were reported, but to this reporter, who was present, there were none. The President was received politely, though not enthusiastically.

When he entered the convention hall most delegates stood and applauded him.

Others sat silently. He was lightly applauded at least eight times. He drew critical laughter on two occasions when delegates disagreed with his assessment of gains being made against price increases.

However, hardly half an hour after the speech ended, "disturbed" Nixon Administration spokesmen were advising newspaper wire services and radio and television network news departments that Pres. Nixon had been "insulted" by labor at the convention.

According to George Meany, AFL-CIO president, Pres. Nixon was invited on Sept. 23 to address the convention. A few days later AFL-CIO was told that the President would look over his schedule, and get in touch with Mr. Meany later.

There was no word directly to AFL-CIO from the White House for seven weeks. Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson was reported as saying in Chicago that the President would not attend but would send his greeting through Sec. Hodgson.

On the evening before the convention, Mr. Meany received a telephone call advising that the President would like to address the convention at noon the next day. The AFL-CIO Executive Council had an important luncheon meeting at that time.

Mr. Meany said that the noontime hour was not practical, but that the President would be welcome to speak Thursday afternoon or anytime Friday. An alternative time was then set for 10:30 Friday morning, the second day of the convention.

Secret Service and other presidential aides took over and laid out detailed plans for the appearance. AFL-CIO cooperated except on two requests: the White House wanted the speech televised live, but to comply with the request required moving four tables on the convention floor and displacing 100 delegates; AFL-CIO said they could not do this.

Also the White House asked to have the convention orchestra play "Ruffles and Flourishes" as the President entered the hall. But Mr. Meany said there would be "only what you might call a chamber group," and "you can't play 'Ruffles and Flourishes' on violins."

Subsequent published reports that have been echoes of comments by Republican leaders say AFL-CIO refused live coverage of the speech and sent its orchestra out of the hall so that it could not play a presidential greeting.

Reports also say that Mr. Meany refused to introduce Pres. Nixon. AFL-CIO insists that Mr. Meany's introduction was the traditional one for any president: "Ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States."

After the address during which the President was noticeably nervous, Mr. Meany went to the microphone routinely to express appreciation. According to security arrangements, he was to do this and then leave the platform with the President accompanied by an escort committee.

The President left the platform alone, while Mr. Meany was at the microphone. As he did, security officers removed the rope barrier that had been erected at their insistence to keep delegates back, and the President went into the delegates' area.

Labor sources say that a White House photographer and an assistant with floodlights appeared to take pictures of the President shaking hands with delegates.

Mr. Meany was obviously surprised. Delegates began breaking from delegations in other parts of the crowded hall. He rapped his gavel and said. "Will the delegates and guests kindly take their seats." After the President left the hall, Mr. Meany said, "Well, let's go on with the second act." These two remarks were the basis of later reports that Mr. Meany snubbed and insulted the President.

Mr. Meany and delegates who now have gone home to their union constituencies were convinced that the President's appearance was political in purpose, that it was part of the strategy aimed at splitting labor's rank-and-file.

The incidents at Bal Harbour, Fla., might have faded away quickly except for the national reaction. Treasury Sec. John B. Connally, Jr., House minority leader Gerald R. Ford, and others high in the Republican Party took occasion to attack Mr. Meany and labor for "insulting" the President.

Management organizations such as the National Association of Manufacturers deplored the "arrogance" of organized labor.

The White House indicated mail and wire support coming in from across the country for the President.

The large question now: Can Phase 2, that depends so largely upon cooperation, succeed in an atmosphere of infighting?

GRADUATION CEREMONIES for the 39th class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development included presentation of diplomas by Andrew C. McLellan, left, the AFL-CIO's inter-American representative. Receiving his certificate is German Larenas Kramer, of Chile, the class spokesman.

Social Changes Spur Latin Union Growth

The economic, industrial and social changes occurring in Latin America are telescoping into a few years the experience of decades in the more developed industrial nations, a Labor Dept. official told the 39th graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

"It is evident that the labor-movements, in their vital role of protecting the interests of the working population must progress at an accelerated rate of speed in their approach to . . . responsible participation in the democratic development of society," said Donald M. Irwin, a deputy under secretary for international affairs.

Irwin's remarks were made during graduation ceremonies for 25 students, representing 12 Latin American countries.

The students completed a six-week course on Community Development & Cooperatives at the AIFLD's Front Royal, Va., institute with side trips to Mexico, the West Virginia coal fields and New York's Spanish Harlem.

The aim of the AIFLD program is to strengthen democratic trade unionism in Latin America and make possible direct worker participation in the Alliance for Progress.

Irwin told the graduates that when unions are injected into the planning and control mechanisms of an economy, "they need to cope in a responsible fashion with the tough questions where simple choices are not to be found."

Chosen to speak for the class was German Larenas Kramer, a lawyer for a community services center in Santiago, Chile.

"We should like to see an enormous concerted effort by all the countries of Latin America, with the support of the United States, to foster social development which might modernize our societies and end this domination of the many by the few," he said.

"We have seen that all the workers of our Americas face similar problems and that we must unite in the struggle and the search for just solutions while respecting the nuances and realities which shape our varying situations."

Andrew C. McLellan, the AFL-CIO's inter-American representative, presented diplomas to the graduates.

Activities Schedule For Studies Center

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center has 10 institutes scheduled for December and January, including six special seminars on occupational safety and health. They are:

Unions in American Society in the Next Decade, Dec. 6-10.

Health Care in the United States, Dec. 13-17.

New Staff Program, Jan. 16-18.

Arbitration Institute, (at University of Illinois, Champaign), Jan. 23-28.

The occupational safety institutes will be at the University of Missouri, Columbia, Dec. 6-10; University of California, Berkeley, Dec. 13-16; Universities of Massachusetts, Amherst, and Wisconsin, Madison, Jan. 10-13; Ohio State University, Jan. 16-19, and Pennsylvania State University, University Park, Jan. 30-Feb. 4.

Hearing Asked On State Safety Enforcement

The AFL-CIO has requested an administrative hearing to look into the Labor Dept.'s application of the federal job safety law in state enforcement programs.

Organized labor has repeatedly protested that the rule adopted by the Labor Dept. for the development and enforcement of state job safety plans falls short of federal standards.

In a letter to Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, the federation's Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health charged that this rule "constitutes an abuse of the discretionary power vested by Congress in the Secretary of Labor."

George H. R. Taylor, executive secretary of the committee, said that the questionable rule allows a state to submit and have approved an enforcement plan that is based "on a series of nebulous promises of future performance."

He further noted that such plans can meet indices of performance "which do not afford at least as effective protections of the health and safety of workers as those set forth under the federal provisions of the act."

Approval of the state plans will result in millions of workers being denied equal protection under the law, Taylor stressed.

President Forced to Choose:

New Veto Threats Sharpen Nixon Clash with Congress

cause the party in power normally finds it easier to raise funds.

A steady stream of White House pronouncements had termed the Senate-passed bill completely unacceptable to Pres. Nixon.

It was a "budget-buster," the President and his aides complained. What the Senate had done was to balance out the heavy tax cuts the Nixon Administration had proposed for business with a variety of reductions for individual taxpayers, particularly those in the lowest-income brackets.

It had also added a generous program of tax deductions for child care expenses and a new program of extended unemployment benefits in states with a jobless rate of 6 percent or more.

The President's initial blast at the Senate bill coupled both the non-business tax cuts and the campaign funding plan as "unacceptable."

Partly as a result of the White House pressure, and partly because of House opposition to large-scale Senate rewriting of legislation, the conferees scrapped most of the Senate revenue amendments.

The extended unemployment benefit provision was discarded as "non-germane" to the bill.

An increase in the personal exemption for each taxpayer to $800 in 1972 was dropped to the House-passed level of $750.

A Senate-proposed $300 tax credit to reimburse elderly persons for property taxes or the tax share of their apartment rent was stricken from the bill.

Provisions authorizing the President to raise the surcharge on imports, impose quotas or retaliate against countries that place restrictions on U.S. goods were dropped.

So were various other revenue-losing Senate amendments, including a tax credit for college costs and a higher investment tax credit for firms located in areas with high unemployment.

The child care deduction provision stayed largely intact, although it was trimmed back somewhat.

And the increase in the minimum standard deduction—a benefit for low-income families—was made applicable for next year as in the House bill rather than for the 1971 tax as the Senate had voted.

While business benefits remained high, when the conferees had completed their work on the revenue sections of the bill the tax cut for a couple with two children and an income of $10,000 would amount to only $19 this year and $38 in 1972.

The White House agreed that the revenue provisions now were acceptable to the President, but bluntly asserted that the bill would still be vetoed if the campaign funding provision was retained.

"This is not a bluff," Nixon's press secretary Ronald Ziegler, told newsmen.

After the conferees put off the effective date until 1976, however, White House spokesmen held out a possibility that the President might sign the bill after all.

On the child care program—tied to a bill extending the Economic Opportunity Act, the basic anti-poverty program—a House-Senate conference committee had already trimmed back the legislation so that free care would be available only to families below the poverty level.

Most of the committee members, including several Republicans who helped work out the compromise, were under the impression that the final version was acceptable to the Administration, or at least to Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Elliot L. Richardson.

But with White House encouragement, House Republicans served notice they will fight to kill the entire bill when the conference report reaches the floor. And Richardson, after a White House meeting, sent a letter declaring the measure unacceptable because it gives cities preference over states as "prime sponsors" of comprehensive child care programs.

The Administration has sought only custodial-type "baby-sitting" programs so that mothers on welfare could take jobs. By contrast, the congressional approach has been for quality care that would help the development of the child and be available to a broader segment of the population than just welfare families.

Nominee for Treasurer Hit on Hiring Record

gaged in the practice of hiring illegal entrants for the purpose of exploiting them."

Earlier, Mrs. Banuelos told the committee she was "unaware" that her firm had been employing illegals until federal immigration agents raided her premises Oct. 5 and seized 36 of her workers.

But U.S. Immigration & Naturalization Commissioner Raymond F. Farrell confirmed to the committee that the raid was the sixth his agency had conducted at Mrs. Banuelos' taco and tortilla factory in the past four years—and each had turned up illegals in the work force.

The job of Treasurer of the United States, whose name appears on all currency, is considered a political plum and has few duties. And her appointment was considered a move by Pres. Nixon to win political favor in the Mexican-American community.

But Kircher, who was accompanied by AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Kenneth Meiklejohn, said it was no compliment to pass up many highly-qualified Mexican-Americans to appoint "a person who has such questionable employer practices so deeply etched in her record."

He noted that a bill recently passed by the California legislature and signed into law by Republican Gov. Ronald Reagan would subject employers such as Mrs. Banuelos to criminal penalties for knowingly employing illegals.

In view of the repeated raids, he said, it is hardly credible that Mrs. Banuelos wasn't aware of her firm's hiring practices.

And, Kircher added, "she certainly knew what she was saying during a union organizing campaign at the factory when she told workers that the union couldn't protect their right to stay in this country."

Kircher told the committee that "the NLRB files indicate that Mrs. Banuelos didn't cotton too well to the idea of the workers unionizing, which is another characteristic of employers in their usage of wetbacks."

Funds Asked For Freedom Stations

The AFL-CIO has called for continued funding of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty while a tripartite commission studies the activities of both agencies.

In a letter to members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said: "Organized labor has long supported the lessening of tensions between the peoples of the East and West by means of the free flow of meaningful information and ideas—a concept which has served as the guiding principle of these two agencies of our government."

Smaller Areas Absorb Shift in Jobless Rates

Severe unemployment conditions shifted somewhat in November as the Labor Dept. reported the number of major areas with a jobless rate of 6 percent or more dropped from 65 to 60 while the list of smaller areas rose from 785 to 799.

Seven of the nation's 150 major job centers were removed from the "substantial" unemployment category and two others were added.

At the same time, 17 "non-major" job centers were put on the substantial unemployment list and only three were removed, the Labor Dept. said.

The major areas deleted from the substantial unemployment category are Binghamton, N.Y.; Flint, Kalamazoo, and Saginaw, Mich.; Dayton, O.; Shreveport, La., and Fort Worth, Tex.

Added to the list are Johnstown, Pa., and San Juan, P.R.

The Labor Dept.'s substantial unemployment list for November includes the 60 major areas and 299 "other" areas. But six of the major areas and 504 "other" areas are also classified as having "persistent" unemployment.

Areas with persistent unemployment, as defined by the Labor Dept., are those having a jobless rate of 6 percent or more for the past calendar year and at least 50 percent above the national average for several years. Substantial unemployment means that an area has unemployment of 6 percent more and the trend is expected to continue for at least two more months.

The 17 smaller job centers put on the substantial unemployment list include 10 areas in Minnesota: Arlington, Cloquet, Fergus Falls, Glenwood, Granite Falls, LaCrescent, Montevideo, Morrris, St. Cloud and Winona. The others are Athol and Gardner, Mass.; Hawthorne, Nev.; Gatesville and Swan Quarter, N.C.; Williamsport, Pa., and Drakes Branch, Va.

The three smaller areas removed from the list are St. Joseph, Mo.; Manteo, N.C., and Conway, S.C.

'Here's Your Buying Guide!'

Election Spending Limit Cleared by Wide Margin

Candidates with the most money to spend won't be able to dominate the airways during election campaigns under legislation that both the House and Senate passed by huge, bipartisan majorities.

The similar, but not identical, bills impose spending ceilings for major campaign expenses and close glaring loopholes in existing laws requiring the reporting of campaign spending and large, individual contributions.

A House-Senate conference committee has been set up to reconcile the bill passed by the House on Nov. 30, 372-23, with the version adopted by the Senate last August on an 88-2 vote.

The overwhelming bipartisan support appeared to preclude the danger of a presidential veto. Last year, Pres. Nixon vetoed a bill limiting spending for radio and television broadcasts but not curbing other campaign expenditures.

Both the House and Senate bills apply to campaigns for all federal offices—Congress as well as the presidency. The legislation is separate from the provision the Senate wrote into the tax bill allowing voters to earmark $1 of their tax money to finance presidential campaigns. It neither contradicts nor is dependent on the presidential campaign fund.

The election reform legislation had strong labor support. Its key provisions include:

- A limit of 10 cents for each person of voting age in the constituency for specified major campaign expenses. Both bills apply the limitation to campaign broadcasts and advertising in printed media, including newspapers, magazines and billboards. The House added to this list the cost of computerized mailings and automated telephone campaigns.

No more than 6 cents per potential voter, however, could be spent for television and radio broadcasts.

- A limit on the amount of money a candidate may spend from his own pocket for campaign expenses. This is intended to lessen the advantage now held by wealthy candidates. In the 1970 elections, for example, 11 of the 15 major senatorial candidates in the seven largest states were millionaires.
- Strict reporting of all campaign expenditures and contributions, including the previously anonymous fund-raising functions in the District of Columbia. The Senate bill would establish a federal elections commission to oversee enforcement and would require reports to the clerk of the local U.S. district court. The House version would merely require reports to be filed with the clerk of the House or the secretary of the Senate. Under the Senate version, individual contributors of $100 or more would be identified by name. The House bill would identify only donors of over $100—thus excluding purchasers of tickets for traditional "$100-a-plate" fund-raising dinners and receptions.
- The Senate bill, but not the House version, would repeal the "equal time" provision for broadcasters, allowing stations to give free time to major candidates without equal treatment for every minor party candidate.

12-4-71

A threatened anti-labor amendment to the House bill never reached a vote as its sponsor, Rep. Philip M. Crane (R-Ill.) found himself outmanuevered.

Crane, an extreme conservative, sought to bar unions from spending their funds for a variety of purposes permitted under present law, including nonpartisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns.

But the House adopted instead a substitute amendment that merely wrote into law existing court rulings specifying the right of unions to communicate with their members on political issues and carry on voter campaigns that are aimed at union members and their families.

There is no change in the existing law prohibiting contributions from the treasuries of unions or corporations to candidates for federal office, but allowing voluntary contributions through groups such as COPE and its business counterparts.

Child Care Veto Assailed As 'Crass Political Action'

Tax Handout Is Cleared By Congress

Congress put its final stamp of approval on a tax bill that the AFL-CIO charged would hand over to rich corporations billions of dollars that are needed to meet America's pressing public needs.

The final version of the Administration-sponsored tax legislation will enable business firms to pocket more than $88 billion in tax savings over the next decade—substantially more than twice the amount of tax savings for individuals.

It is "tax folly," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said, not "tax justice." It represents an "unconscionable redistribution of wealth to those who already have much."

A House-Senate conference committee bowed to most Administration demands in dropping Senate-added provisions that would have provided greater equity for individual taxpayers. And it alleviated Republican fears that Democrats would be able to match GOP spending in the 1972 presidential election through a procedure allowing taxpayers to voluntarily allocate $1 of their payments to a presidential campaign fund. The effective date was put off until the 1976 election.

Labor had urged rejection of the final version of the bill. But the House approved the conference report by a 320-74 vote. And the Senate quickly followed suit, thus clearing the bill for the President's signature.

The biggest boon to corporations is a permanent 7 percent investment tax credit that will amount over 10 years to a government subsidy estimated at $52 billion on the cost of equipment. Over the same period, companies will pocket more than $30 billion through an accelerated depreciation formula written into law.

The largest savings to individuals would come through repeal of the excise tax on cars and a higher standard deduction for low-income taxpayers. While welcoming these improvements, the AFL-CIO termed them "meager sops."

As for the Administration's claim that its tax bill is a "job development" program, Biemiller said "no one should be deceived by the Madison Avenue gimmickry in the title. It will not develop jobs or revive America's badly-depressed economy. All it would do is give public money to private corporations who certainly don't need a government handout."

Court Ruling Deals Blow To Retirees

The U.S. Supreme Court dealt a severe blow to retired workers when it ruled that their unions have no right to negotiate benefit improvements for them because retirees are not "employes" subject to the protection of the National Labor Relations Act.

The decision could upset the established practice of bargaining on retirees' benefits which has been going for more than 20 years in some industries. The Steelworkers, for example, have historically bargained to improve benefits for its retired members, although management has stipulated that it wasn't obligated to do so.

The high court, in a 6-1 decision, upheld a ruling of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals involving Allied Chemical Workers Local 1 and the Chemical Division of Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.

The union had negotiated a health insurance plan for workers at the company's Barberton, O., facilities, and after the introduction of Medicare, it sought to renogiate benefits for retirees.

The company refused to bargain on the issue and made unilateral adjustments in the financing of the benefits. Pittsburgh Plate Glass contended that it had no obligation to negotiate on benefits paid to workers already retired.

A trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board ruled in favor of the company on the

5.2 Million Out of Work:

Jobless Rate Back At 6 Percent Mark

By Tom Castor

Unemployment climbed back to the 6 percent mark in November, or substantially the same level of joblessness that has persisted in the American economy for 13 straight months, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The BLS said that the bulk of the overall rise in joblessness stemmed from job losses by white males in the 20-24 age group who had been employed full-time, rather than from the unusually large number of persons entering the civilian labor force—389,000.

Employment increased on a seasonally adjusted basis to 80 million, the highest level in the history of the country, but 5.2 million American workers were without jobs.

The increase in employment was concentrated among adult women, the BLS said.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said the November statistics "once again . . . give the lie to Administration rhetoric."

"They prove the President's policies have not even made a dent in America's worst economic problem —unemployment."

"American workers—those unemployed or partially employed or facing layoffs—know that unemployment won't be ended by either slogans about the 'new prosperity' or giant tax handouts to wealthy corporations," Kirkland said.

"America must be put back to work and an Administration dominated by the big business 'trickle down' theory is not doing the job," he declared.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson laid part of the blame at the door of Congress, which he said has failed to act on Administration bills designed "to stimulate employment."

"For the third month in a row," Hodgson said, "I find it necessary to urge the Congress to act." He called the unemployment level "unacceptable," and said "perhaps more than words, these unemployment figures dictate the need for immediate congressional action."

While Pres. Nixon's new economic policies may not have been making a dent in the unemploy-

Kirkland Hits Appeasement Of Rightists

By David L. Perlman

A historic new program of quality day-care services for children of working mothers was killed by Pres. Nixon's veto before it could draw its first breath.

Its enactment had been hailed as one of the great congressional accomplishments of this generation. It would, if signed into law, have authorized a multi-billion dollar federal program for local-sponsored and operated child care centers offering a full range of educational, health and nutritional services.

Nixon's veto is "indefensible" and a "crass political action," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said. "At the very time he is demanding that Congress pass a tax bill loaded with giveaways to the nation's giant corporations, he is denying federal help to the children of working people and to the poor."

Kirkland charged that the bill was vetoed "to appease the Republican Party's extreme right wing."

Nixon's veto message in fact parroted in only slightly less extreme language the blatant scare tactics ultra-conservative groups had used to distort the nature of the bill.

It is "the most radical piece of legislation to emerge from the 92nd Congress," Nixon claimed.

All but embracing the extremists' charge that providing quality care for children whose parents are at work would somehow break up the American family, the President said: "There is a respectable school of opinion that this legislation

Nixon Pension 'Reform' Scored as Boon to Rich

Pres. Nixon's so-called pension reform plan would be another tax bonanza for the wealthy, the AFL-CIO charged, with few if any advantages for the average worker.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland termed the President's glowing description of his proposal "an exercise in deceit."

The proposal relegates to a "study" by two government departments the one area of pension reform most important to America's workers—a reinsurance program that would guarantee payment of earned pension benefits even if an employer went out of business, defaulted on his payments or was swallowed up by another company.

By contrast, Kirkland noted, there would be all sorts of tax advantages for what Nixon described as "self-reliant" Americans.

"For the average man," Kirkland said, "the President's pension proposal is an exercise in deceit. It promises much, but it will deliver nothing for today's elderly and nothing in the future for those whose income is below $10,000 a year.

"It is a bonanza for banks, insurance companies and mutual funds—another raid on the federal treasury to benefit the wealthy.

"We will fight it vigorously in the Congress and will continue our efforts to constantly improve the social security program."

The principal beneficiaries of the new round of tax exemptions proposed would be such high-income professionals as doctors and lawyers.

Lower-income self-employed workers might have the theoretical right to set up tax-sheltered retire-

Business Group Sells 'New Prosperity' Line

A "nonpartisan" group of businessmen has formed an organization called the Citizens for a New Prosperity aimed at merchandising Pres. Nixon's Phase 2 control program to "stop inflation."

Billed as a nonprofit public service organization and as tax exempt, the idea was the brainchild of Hobart Lewis, president and editor-in-chief of The Reader's Digest, and hotel-restaurant magnate J. William Marriott, Sr., both staunch Republican supporters and contributors.

Although Lewis denied to newsmen that his close friend, Pres. Richard Nixon, suggested the effort, he did say that he and Marriott asked the White House about it "and naturally they were delighted. We've had full cooperation from the White House."

Citizens for a New Prosperity even sponsored a "New Prosperity Week," Nov. 29-Dec. 4, to hold down prices.

But questions arose as to just how serious this effort was when it became known that Lewis's Reader's Digest asked for a rate increase during New Prosperity Week. The request was referred back to the magazine by the Price Commission for further information.

ment rate, they made a 74-cent dent in average weekly earnings which were down to $128.74 from October.

Average hourly earnings, at $3.47, were off 2 cents from October.

The teen-age jobless rate stood at 17 percent for the fourth consecutive month, and the jobless rate for whites rose from 5.3 to 5.7 percent after edging down in the August-November period.

The unemployment rate for Negroes, which had been on the increase since the beginning of the year, dropped from 10.7 percent to 9.3 percent.

The number of workers with part-time jobs for economic reasons—those who want full-time work, but can't find it—rose to a 10-year high of 2.6 million, seasonally adjusted. The number has hovered around the 2.5-million mark for a year.

The average duration of joblessness dropped in November from 12.2 weeks to 11.7 weeks—but mostly due to a large increase in the ranks of those unemployed five weeks or less.

Since May, the average duration of unemployment has fluctuated narrowly around 12 weeks, about 3 weeks above the year-ago levels.

The number of those unemployed 15 weeks or more totalled 726,000, jumping 185,000 from the previous month. Workers unemployed 27 weeks or more declined from nearly 600,000 to 567,000, seasonally adjusted.

The unemployment rate for Vietnam-era veterans in the 20-29 age group jumped from 7 to 8.2 percent during November, returning to the level of last spring, but still below the 11 percent high recorded last February.

The number of unemployed veterans increased 50,000 over the month to 320,000.

For nonveterans in the same age group, unemployment remained at 7 percent, essentially unchanged from October.

The average work week for rank-and-file workers rose one-tenth of 1 hour to 37.2 hours.

Wage Control Waiver Asked At $125 Level

A delegation of hotel and motel workers from the New York City area called on Congress to exclude workers earning less than $125 a week from the Phase 2 wage controls.

A 5.5 per cent ceiling on wage increases for these workers will cause severe hardship on them and their families, 100 representatives of the New York Hotel & Motel Trades Council said.

The group presented Congress a petition containing 15,000 signatures from among its 30,000 affiliated council members. The council is made up of locals from seven AFL-CIO unions.

Phase 2 controls will have a significant impact on the wage earner at the lower end of the economic ladder, including those in the hotel and motel service industry, the group said.

It stressed that virtually all the income of workers in the industry earning less than $125 a week is used to pay for essential family needs—food, clothing and shelter.

The delegation headed by Council Pres. Jay Rubin and Legislative Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert, met on Capitol Hill with congressional representatives from the New York-New Jersey-Connecticut area.

It also had sessions with Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) and House Speaker Carl Albert.

The council is made up of locals from the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Hotel & Restaurant Employes, Upholsterers, Firemen & Oilers, Service Employes, Operating Engineers and the Painters.

NLRB Ruling Upholds Rejection of 'Lie' Test

Louisville, Ky.—An employer cannot discharge a worker for refusing to submit to a polygraph or "lie-detector" test involving questions about his love life or his union activities, a trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

The examiner recommended that the NLRB order National Food Service, Inc., here to reinstate three workers with full back pay.

They were discharged because they refused to take the lie-detector test in which they would be required to answer questions on whether they had violated a company policy forbidding employes to date each other.

One of three men discharged was the principal in-plant organizer for Teamsters Local 783 which was attempting to organize National Food at about the same time the dismissals came.

"The discharges stemmed from National Food's use of the polygraph to discourage union activity and to obtain evidence which would have supported the discharge of a key union partisan," the examiner said.

He also recommended that the NLRB order National Food to stop discouraging concerted activities by its employes and to stop unlawfully administering polygraph tests to workers for the purpose of discouraging membership in any labor organization.

The prescribed order also would bar the company from administering polygraph tests pursuant to a rule "which does not provide that the tests will not be used to unlawfully interrogate employes concerning their union or protected concerted activities."

The NLRB general counsel earlier had declared that the company rule requiring employes to submit to a polygraph test was so broad in language as to "unlawfully threaten the employes with discharge for failure to submit to interrogations concerning any subject. . ."

UTU Issues Handbook Of Transportation Data

Cleveland—The United Transportation Union has prepared a new, 282-page "Handbook of Transportation in America" dealing with the government role in transportation, urban mass transit programs and developments in intercity travel.

White House Sees Things Looking Up

Key Biscayne, Fla.—White House Press Sec. Ronald L. Ziegler said the November increase in unemployment was due to an unusually large increase in the labor force as women and teenagers sought Christmas jobs and "also because of what is felt to be increasing confidence in the economy."

"Although we don't know if this is totally the answer, this is what some feel the answer is," he said.

But Ziegler maintained that his statement on labor force growth was economically correct and refused to accept an inquiring reporter's premise that "women seek jobs due to uncertainty in the economy and inflation."

'Crackdown' Urged On Price Violators

Cleveland—AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis has called on the Price Commission and the Internal Revenue Service to "crack down" on retailers who have raised prices in violation of the commission's general guidelines.

Perlis, coordinator of the AFL-CIO's nationwide program to monitor prices, quoted from the commission's guidelines announced on Nov. 11:

"Retailers are to post prominently their freeze period prices for all covered food items and for many other selected items other than food as will be specified in the regulations. Until all such selected prices are posted, retailers are not permitted to increase any prices. In any event, such freeze prices must be posted no later than Jan. 1, 1972."

Perlis said that preliminary reports from price monitoring committees indicate "widespread evasion and violation" of the regulation.

Perlis spoke at a rally sponsored by the Cleveland AFL-CIO and its Dept. of Community Services. About 1,000 representatives of labor, senior citizens, youth, women and minority groups took part in the rally.

"In the face of highly flexible price controls and totally inadequate enforcement, the price control program is a farce," Perlis said.

He charged that the Nixon Administration is destroying the credibility of the IRS by assigning it an impossible job of enforcing price controls. He cited as an example the recent contradictory rulings on rent controls.

Perlis called on consumers to monitor prices of food, rent, health services, clothing and other goods and services. He urged that suspected price violations be reported immediately to the IRS and to AFL-CIO price monitoring committees.

He also called on the IRS to inform all complainants as to the disposition of their complaints and disputed an IRS contention that the Freedom of Information Act bars it from releasing that information.

Answering charges by Virginia Knauer, the President's adviser on consumer affairs, that consumer complaints about price increases were artificially generated, Perlis said: "This ill becomes the so-called champion of consumer interests in the White House."

He continued: "It is obvious that Mrs. Knauer represents not the consumers but the White House."

In a recent interview, Mrs. Knauer said she was satisfied with the Price Commission.

Perlis noted, however, that "the Price Commission has no consumer representatives." He charged also that the chairman of the commission, C. Jackson Grayson, and three of its members, James Newman, William Scranton, and Robert Lanzilotti, all have had "corporate connections."

The Cleveland rally, which was held in the Plumbers Hall here, is one of more than 100 similar rallies scheduled for cities across the country.

It is part of the nationwide effort to train volunteers to check prices and report violations. Perlis said the price watchdog program became necessary when the Administration "failed to provide sufficient enforcement for its price controls."

Senate Vote Revives Extended Jobless Aid

The Senate revived a labor-supported bill to extend unemployment benefits in states with the highest jobless rates, and its prospects for final congressional approval appeared bright.

Last month, the Senate added the jobless aid extension to the House-passed tax bill. But a House-Senate conference committee dropped the amendment on the ground that it would not be germane to the tax bill under the House rules.

But Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) and other co-sponsors of the extended unemployment benefits plan didn't let the matter drop. After touching base with both Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.) and his House counterpart, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), Magnuson proposed his amendment to a non-controversial House bill dealing with the use of unemployment insurance funds for state administrative costs.

The Senate accepted the amendment without objection and the legislation is now before a House-Senate conference committee.

In a letter to the conferees, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller strongly urged approval of the extended benefit provision "at the earliest possible date."

The bill would permit benefits to be paid for up to a total of 65 weeks in heavy unemployment states—26 weeks of additional benefits on top of the 26 weeks of regular state benefits and 13 weeks of extended federal benefits allowed under present law.

Under the formula in the bill, based on insured unemployment and the number of persons who have exhausted their benefits, the following jurisdictions would presently be eligible for an additional 26 weeks of federal payments.

Alaska, California, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Puerto Rico, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

A number of other states are close to the eligibility level.

Biemiller wrote the conferees that more than 1.9 million persons exhausted their unemployment benefits without finding jobs during the 1971 fiscal year nearly double the number in the previous year.

The sharp rise, he said, "speaks for itself. These are persons with long attachment to the labor force, many of whom must now for the first time seek welfare."

Kentucky House Seat Retained by Democrats

Democrat William Curlin won a special election in Kentucky's 6th congressional district to fill the vacancy caused by the death last September of Rep. John C. Watts (D).

Curlin took his seat in the House to bring the Democratic membership back up to 255, with 177 Republicans and three vacancies still unfilled.

100 Stories of Tragedy:

Health Case Histories Show Existing System's Failures

The AFL-CIO has released a supplement to federation Pres. George Meany's Oct. 26 National Health Security testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee to document its charges that the present health system is a failure.

About 100 case histories, compiled by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, were sent to the committee along with a five-page covering letter from AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller.

Biemiller, in his letter to Chairman Wilbur Mills, said that "hundreds of cases dealing with high cost, fragmented care, excessive red tape and problems with private insurers" had been examined in the process of selecting a few "typical cases."

The AFL-CIO had received permission at the October Committee hearings to introduce the study into the hearing record. Biemiller termed the case histories "a human tragedy" and asserted that "many myths are shattered" by them.

The case histories are divided into four different sections which, when totaled, "add up to an indictment of the entire health care system," Biemiller said.

The first section contains 43 cases involving problems with insurance companies or inadequacy of insurance.

One "typical case" cites a 47-year-old woman suffering from interstitial fibrosis, a lung and respiratory disease. Although her hospital expenses were completely covered by insurance, her other medical expenses were not.

She requires six to nine tanks of oxygen a week at $10 a tank in addition to other medicine costing $10 to $12 a week. Although her medical bills are about $90 a week and her husband nets only $94.70 they still do not receive Medicaid.

The study also cites a woman who had been in a group insurance plan since 1961 at a cost of $7.50 a month. When she retired in 1969, her payments were increased to $13.55 a month and her benefits reduced.

In July 1970, the premiums were increased to $15.29 and then to $18.22 this year. On her pension, she commented, "I cannot afford it for the coming year."

The second section of the report consists of 32 cases demonstrating the "devastating effect of illness on people without proper medical insurance."

A disabled Vietnam veteran who owes a hospital $11,283 for the care of his ill wife and more than $5,000 to doctors is quoted as saying, "I have no way of any kind to pay the bill. I had to take my wife out of the hospital because the bill was too much."

In another case, a woman has been sick with diabetes, high blood pressure, shoulder and eye problems.

Her husband makes $1.75 an hour and they have no insurance, but have applied for financial aid to help with their medical expenses.

The answers they received:

Welfare: "If you weren't working, we could help you."

Indian Agency: "Quit work and go back to the reservation and we can give you some help."

The third section of the report, 15 cases, deals with the problems of the poor in obtaining medical care.

A 21-year-old woman died two weeks after she was refused admission—even though she was in active labor—to a Kentucky hospital. Her baby was born at home 15 minutes after she returned from the hospital.

The hospital would not accept her insurance or a personal check.

"I think it was awful," she wrote before her death, "to call the city police and run us off."

Cincinnati was the site of another example of impersonal health care.

Auto Workers Local 683 purchased a kidney machine for one of its members because none was available in the area. The machine, set up in the hospital, needed about $100 a month in supplies to keep it running. The hospital refused to furnish the supplies until the local had raised another $400 to pay a standing bill the patient owed.

The machine was donated to the hospital after the man's recovery.

The fourth section, five cases, shows the "fragmentation" of the present system of paying for medical care.

A woman entered a Brooklyn hospital as an emergency case. She spent nine hours in the hospital and was charged $319.

The hospital refused to supply an itemization of the bill, saying it would do so only under court order.

A Puerto Rican steelworker was hurt in a mill accident. He received adequate compensation and treatment for the three toes he had amputated.

While convalescing in the hospital, his family doctor, a fellow countryman, dropped in to visit briefly almost every day of the 34 days he spent in the hospital.

A week after he was released, the steelworker received a bill for $340 from his "friend."

Every case in the study reveals one thing in common, Biemiller said, America's "fragmented, outdated, wasteful health care system."

He stressed the only way to correct the system is with National Health Security.

In closing, he quoted Meany's testimony:

"America needs—and must have—a national health insurance program that provides quality health care for all Americans, that controls escalating costs, that institutes quality standards, that begins the long overdue job of reforming the systems, and is fairly financed and effectively administered. America needs National Health Security."

Senate Okays Powell, Delays Rehnquist Vote

The Senate gave near-unanimous approval to the appointment of Lewis F. Powell, Jr., to the Supreme Court. But the White House was showing signs of nervousness about Pres. Nixon's other nominee to the highest court, William H. Rehnquist.

Senate Republican leaders filed a cloture petition to shut off debate on the Rehnquist nomination as opponents continued to hammer away at the nominee's record on civil liberties, civil rights and executive powers.

If a two-thirds majority votes for cutting off debate on Dec. 10, quick confirmation is assured. Otherwise, a showdown could be delayed until opponents feel they have mustered their strongest showing against the appointment.

A disclosure by Newsweek magazine of a 1952 memo written by Rehnquist when he was a clerk to the late Supreme Court Justice Robert H. Jackson caused a flurry of concern in Administration circles. It vigorously defended the segregationist "separate but equal doctrine" that the court later overturned unanimously.

After several days of silence, Rehnquist said the memorandum was intended to represent Jackson's views in a discussion of a pending case, and not his own. His Senate supporters declared themselves satisfied with the reply.

Pres. Nixon had his way with two other controversial noninations.

The Senate voted 51-44 to confirm Earl L. Butz as Secretary of Agriculture, despite strong opposition based on his association with corporate "agribusiness" and charges that his policies would deal still another blow at family farmers.

Four Republicans joined with 40 Democrats in opposing the nonination and some who voted for confirmation said they did so only because they felt the President has the right to choose his own Cabinet.

On a non-record vote, with only a handful of senators on the floor, Mrs. Romana Banuelos was confirmed as Treasurer of the United States, a largely honorary position. She is the owner of a California food firm that has been repeatedly raided as an employer of Mexicans who illegally crossed the border.

The AFL-CIO had opposed the confirmation of Mrs. Banuelos, Butz and Rehnquist. It did not oppose the confirmation of Powell to the Supreme Court, and the Senate voted 89-1 to ratify the appointment. Powell said he does not expect to take his seat before January. The Richmond, Va., attorney is a former president of the American Bar Association.

Business Unit Formed to Sell Phase 2 Plan

Digest's president's name—asks businessmen to join in sponsoring sales events on merchandise priced at or below the freeze level.

The group is financing its campaign through tax-exempt donations. It said it has received verbal assurance from the Internal Revenue Service of the tax exemption.

Initially, it asked the 500 largest companies in the nation for donations ranging from $2,000 to $25,000, and there is a separate tax-exempt fund for private contributions, a spokesman said.

The organization is making use of bumper stickers, decals, speaker's bureaus, press releases and suggested editorials for house organs and trade magazines trying to get everyone to "Keep the Lid On"—the Citizens' motto.

Not only should the lid be kept on prices, but "spiraling" or "unjustified wage increases" also must be blocked, according to literature in the group's press kit.

One red, white and blue bumper sticker, comes with happy faces and the slogan: "Love the New Prosperity."

To keep the lid on prices, Citizens for a New Prosperity is enlisting groups of women across the nation as "price watchers."

There were conflicting reports on what the activities of the price watchers would be.

One spokesman said they would be encouraged to report violations, but another said they would have a more "positive" role.

"They'll go out and ask for cooperation," seeking to have merchants post "Stop Inflation" decals and "We're Pledged to Keep the Lid On" posters in their stores.

Labor Pulls Out of Business Parley, Rejects 'Do-Nothing' Advisory Role

Organized labor is withdrawing its support of the White House Conference on the Industrial World Ahead scheduled for Feb. 7-9 to look into business conditions over the next two decades.

Representatives of the AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers resigned from the do-nothing advisory committee that was set up to develop the conference program.

The federation's representatives on the committee were Education Director Walter G. Davis and Research Director Nat Goldfinger.

In a telegram to White House conference director Robert E. Miller, Davis and Goldfinger said in tendering their resignations: "We further wish to advise that the AFL-CIO will be unable to participate in or support the conference."

Davis noted that the White House conference staff had failed to consult with the AFL-CIO, the UAW or the Teamsters "as is the usual case when labor participation is sought."

He pointed out, however, that periodic reports were made on the planning for the conference.

The purpose of the committee, Davis said, was to assist in the development and planning of program subjects and presentations and to oversee the selection of conference delegates.

The committee was established under an executive order to represent labor, business and educators, Davis noted. At its first meeting in June, the committee was presented with several documents describing the work already completed in the pre-planning stages.

Davis said that "several regional meetings had already been held, topics for the conference pinned down, and position papers commissioned—all without consultation of the newly established committee."

"Labor members noted that there would not be any major points left for which their advice could be helpful since all of these matters had already been settled," he stressed.

The resignations were submitted "so that labor participants would be aware that the conference planning did not include any imput from the advisory committee as a whole or any of its labor members."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland alerted all federation affiliates and state central bodies of the action, noting that organized labor would not participate in or support the conference.

Labor Newsman Frank Porter Dies

Frank C. Porter, the Washington Post's highly-regarded labor and business reporter and a longtime member of the Newspaper Guild, died at the age of 53.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany voiced labor's sorrow, describing Porter as "a credit to his profession—a dedicated, honest, careful reporter."

Porter's death was attributed to oxygen starvation of the brain after he choked on a piece of food while dining with friends at a Washington restaurant.

He is survived by his wife and four children, aged 7 to 13.

Politics and Jobs

WHEN THE LABOR DEPT. reported that 60 out of every 1,000 Americans able and ready to work couldn't find jobs in November, the White House said that really wasn't very important because there were more people working than ever before.

To provide some understanding of the Administration's posture consider the following:

- Unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis increased by 212,000 last month to a total of 5,150,000.
- The seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment moved toward the 1971 peak of 6.2 percent as it rose from 5.8 to 6 percent.
- The jobless rate for adult men rose to 4.4 percent.
- The jobless rate for adult women climbed to 5.8 percent.
- The jobless rate for married men—the family breadwinners—spurted from 3 percent to 3.4 percent.
- The number of persons who want full-time jobs but have only been able to find part-time employment or have been working shorter workweeks for economic reasons reached a 10-year high in November, climbing to 2,616,000.

The Nixon Administration has achieved a notoriety for its yo-yo comments on release of reports on unemployment, living costs and other vital economic indicators. Mostly the White House reactions have been keyed to putting the best possible political face on a continuing record of failure in dealing with the economy.

But to achieve political gain at the expense of unemployed Americans displays a callousness, a heartlessness, a lack of compassion that is foreign to this great and generous nation.

An Ancient Code of Conduct

There is an ancient set of customs governing the respective obligations of guests and hosts that seems especially pertinent to the recent visit of Pres. Nixon to the AFL-CIO convention. The rules have been posted for centuries in monasteries and are generally credited to Saint Benedict. This is what they say:

If any pilgrim monk come from distant parts, if with wish as a guest to dwell in the monastery, and will be content with the customs which he finds in the place, & do not perchance by his lavishness disturb the monastery, but is simply content with what he finds, he shall be received, for as long a time as he desires. If, indeed, he find fault with anything, or expose it, reasonably, and with the humility of charity, the Abbott shall discuss it prudently, lest perchance God had sent him for this very thing. But, if he have been found gossipy and contumacious in the time of his sojourn as guest, not only ought he not to be joined to the body of the monastery, but also it shall be said to him, honestly, that he must depart. If he does not go, let two stout monks, in the name of God, explain the matter to him.

Same Old Ball Game

A Word Edgewise:

Whatever Happens in Ulster, Everybody Will End Up Losing

By John P. Roche

IN RECENT YEARS, we have seen an increasing number of situations where no matter what happens, everybody loses. Head and shoulders above the others is, of course, the outbreak of a nuclear war. But developments in Ulster and Pakistan seem to fall into the same category.

Gone are the good old days when international relations could be looked on as a zero-sum game: we win, they lose (Cuba, 1962); they win, we lose (Soviet seizure of Eastern Europe in violation of Yalta, Communist victory in Mainland China). Even the successful stalemate (Germany, Korea) appears antiquated. We seem to face problems for which there simply are no solutions.

Take Ulster. From some analyses, you might get the impression that the Protestant majority (actually about 60 percent) of the six counties of Northern Ireland rushed over from England and Scotland in the last 20 years.

The fact is that Protestant "plantations" began under Elizabeth I and were massively strengthened by Cromwell in the 17th Century. As long as the British treated Ireland as an entity and left its management, and exploitation, in the hands of "horse Protestants" of the Anglican, upper-class Church of Ireland, the "lower orders," Catholic and Presbyterian, often worked hand-in-hand for Irish freedom.

Indeed, one of the things that broke the back of the Irish rising of 1798 was that Gen. Gerard Lake, the British commander, had pre-emptively, under threat of execution, disarmed all Ulstermen—Protestant and Catholic alike.

History is full of tragedies arising from roads not taken. It is enough to say that the great dream of a united Ireland based on freedom and religious toleration degenerated, by the late 19th Century, into a nightmare of sectarian strife.

Various British politicians—Edward Carson being the most notorious—encouraged this bitterness, going so far as to support a mutiny by British officers against Irish Home Rule. The outcome was a "temporary" arrangement where six counties were carved out to provide a Protestant autonomous enclave. It made no sense demographically, geographically or economically (Ulster is a monumental welfare program from the viewpoint of the British Treasury). But there it is.

Now the gunmen are on the loose. As usual, the extremes feed each other: the Irish Republican Army bushwackers generate wild, irrational emotions among the Protestants; the Orange Order thugs have the Catholics—figuratively speaking—sharpening their spikes and waiting for the "Rising of the Moon."

Caught in the enfilade is the vast majority of citizens of both faiths who mainly just want to live in peace. And the 15,000 British soldiers who have been sent to try to make this possible.

Also caught in the maelstrom is Prime Minister Jack Lynch in Dublin, an eminently sensible and courageous man who knows insanity when he sees it. But he is flanked on the left by hard-nosed types who want to "liberate the six orphans" and he barely survived a recent vote of confidence in the Dail, the Irish Parliament. Lynch is in a thoroughly unenviable position: he can not go forward and endorse forceful liberation, but he cannot back off from the concept of unification.

MEANWHILE, ACROSS THE IRISH SEA, the British are having their own difficulties, not the least of which is that for the first time they are seeing their people, and British soldiers, dying on TV. (Indeed, the BBC has taken to censoring some of its programs directed to Ulster on the ground that "we try to avoid the moment when a spark could lead to further explosions"—John Crowley of the BBC, quoted in "Atlas," November 1971.)

The Conservatives have traditional links with Ulster, but the Labor Party—many of whose supporters are Irish immigrants—is moving towards the abolition of Ulster's autonomy, that is, integrating it into the United Kingdom on the same basis as Wales and Scotland. But from the Irish Catholic viewpoint, this would be a step away from unification—though it would eliminate the detested Stormont Parliament.

Any reader who has survived this far will probably appreciate why Sen. Edward Kennedy's blithe intervention, centering on a proposed British troop pull-out, was not warmly received by anybody but the IRA. For as Dr. Conor Cruise O'Brien, foreign affairs spokesman of the Irish Labor Party and member of the Dail, stated flatly a while ago, the withdrawal of British troops "would almost certainly lead to the massacre of tens of thousands of Catholics by Protestant extremists."

Perhaps the troops can't solve anything, but at least they can prevent certain alternative solutions.

Benefit to Foreign Workers:

Developing Nations Ask Aid Of U.S. Unions on Fair Trade

The following is excerpted from an address to the Ninth AFL-CIO Convention at Bal Harbour, Fla., by Hugh Lawson Shearer, prime minister of Jamaica.

THE GREAT UNIONS of America have had an enviable record in giving support both directly and through various agencies, including the AIFLD, to trade union movements outside of the United States, but there is a continuing need for such support; support in education and training in organizational techniques, in the provision of technical assistance to set up research departments, and in all the areas which will result in the development of viable trade union movements motivated solely to secure the best interests of their members.

By this system, we not only ensure that democracy is preserved but we also underwrite the preservation of peace and prosperity in the developing world. There is very little point in the developing world feeling that its governments are masters in their own house if this is at the expense of the freedom and liberties of its citizens, and I urge this support not because of some abstract respect for democracy, but because in practice, it is the real vital factor of ensuring the dignity of human beings.

No man is an island to himself any more than is a group of men. The tragic events of this century have shown that we cannot contract out of the problems of others. We ignore them at our peril. Poverty and instability in one country can have profound effects on the people of the other countries. An understanding and broad sympathy are needed of the special conditions attached to other peoples.

Often trade unionists in the United States complain of unfair competition from what is called cheap foreign labor. I do not defend these cases where goods are deliberately dumped, or cases where workers are cruelly exploited and are made to work unreasonably long hours for starvation wages.

In these cases we fully support the trade union movements in the larger countries and the efforts of international agencies to protect the workers of those countries and assist them to organize themselves so that they can fight for better conditions of life.

It is wrong, however, to extend this principle to those cases where differences in workers' wages merely reflect differences between the huge productive capacity of the developed country and that of other countries. A worker who enjoys the benefit of the most modern technology in his factory and who has an enormous investment of capital and equipment assisting him must produce more per man hour than the worker who is working with small or primitive equipment. It follows that in one case very high rates of wages are justified, and in the other, similar wages are not possible.

If the worker in the poor country, therefore, cannot find a market for his labor as embodied in goods, outside his own limited and poor home market, he is doomed to continued poverty.

We in the developing countries, to be able to buy the goods you produce and pay back loans we borrow, must be able to trade by selling in your markets the products we are best able to produce. Developing countries depend on the AFL-CIO to use your considerable influence to help to stimulate and expand policies which recognize these basic facts. We live in a world of interdependence and we need the support of one another, strong and weak, rich and poor, for our mutual advantage.

We are aware, too, that sometimes we can look at a country as a wealthy country but in fact it does not follow that every single member of that society is enjoying a high standard of living; that there are people who are out of work in wealthy countries and that for such a man, when he considers his responsibility to his family, he cannot understand where the wealth that he is supposed to enjoy is to be found.

TRADE UNION LEADERS even in wealthy countries, have problems with membership—people who may be suffering from lack of work or low wages in depressed areas of their country; as a result of this there is pressure for national action to be taken which could damage the exports of smaller countries.

There are solutions available which will ensure that the interests of both parties are protected in developed countries, which do not exist in developing countries. In the developed countries there are possibilities through research, for example, of improving technology and moving into the manufacture of more complex goods—courses which are not open to the small developing countries with small local markets.

It is said that in some industrial areas of the United States, one-half of the goods now being manufactured were not known 10 years ago. Naturally, from our own point of view we would hope that it is in this area of technological development that the wealthy countries would seek a solution of their problems, leaving the simpler tasks to be carried out by the small developing countries.

When leaders of developing countries plead for liberal trade policies by the developed countries so that their people may be productively employed, this is the context in which, as trade unionists, I urge you to consider your role towards your fellow workers throughout the world.

Legislative Prospects Bright:

Phase 2 Pitfalls Dim Outlook For Consumers in Coming Year

CONSUMERS can expect a good year in Congress in 1972, but it's doubtful they'll fare as well in the marketplace under Pres. Nixon's Phase 2 price controls, consumer specialist Evelyn Dubrow predicted.

Miss Dubrow, legislative representative for the Ladies' Garment Workers, listed creation of an independent consumer agency, no-fault auto insurance, truth-in-advertising and automobile damageability as among several long-sought consumer protection measures that will be "high on the list" in the next session of Congress.

She said that while the White House has given little aid to strong consumer protection, "sincere concern with what's happening to the economics of this country" and its effects on consumers is growing in Congress.

"This is not just a front on the part of Congress" in an election year, she declared, but the result of the growing understanding of "how much the consumer needs protection," and the demands of a "more aware, more alert" consumer constituency for fair treatment. Miss Dubrow appeared on the network interview Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

But Miss Dubrow was not as optimistic about "a good year for consumers, as far as prices being controlled" under the Phase 2 program. She said that assignment of the Internal Revenue Service as the enforcement arm of Phase 2 price controls leaves the program without sufficient staff or "proper standards" to assure compliance.

AND THEY'VE DONE LITTLE "more than suggest that voluntarily, the consumer ought to see that prices aren't raised," which is "just a lot of nonsense," Miss Dubrow said. She pointed out that with "thousands of items supposedly controlled," it's impossible for individual shoppers and consumers to know, from week to week, whether prices have been changed.

"That's a hell of a way to run a railroad," she declared, and stressed that the residents of "the poorer sections of the towns, and cities, and the rural areas, are going to be the victims of . . . phony price controls."

Reporters questioning Miss Dubrow on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine, and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc.

By Press Associates, Inc.

ONE OF THE MANY THRUSTS directed at Pres. Johnson by the Republicans during his years in office was that the White House "managed" the news.

It is still debatable whether there was any foundation to this charge, but there seems to be little question that the nation has just witnessed one of the most adroit efforts at news managing by the White House under the administration of Pres. Nixon.

The President may have suddenly decided to speak to the AFL-CIO convention in Bal Harbour for any number of reasons.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany says that the President came to the convention "to contrive a situation under which he could claim that he had been unfairly treated."

Whatever his motives, the President did speak. Both before and after his address, White House aides were busy people. They called radio and television networks and editors of major newspapers, claiming the President had been treated discourteously.

With some notable exceptions, the press corps which accompanied the President to Florida picked up the White House line. These are men and women who daily "live" with the President and his aides. They rarely forthrightly contradict the White House. Many fear that they will be snubbed if they write unfavorable articles.

On the other hand, most of the labor reporters who covered the convention provided their desks with stories that the President had been treated coldly but politely—he was not abused, not jeered, not insulted.

Across the country there was confusion in more than one newsroom. The net impact, though, is that the White House has convinced a large section of the nation that both Nixon and the Office of the President were rudely treated.

Letters to the editor are appearing in newspapers across the country in which the writers actually claim that the President was jeered and even that he was not allowed to speak.

The role of Presidential Counsel Charles W. Colson in the early White House news managing is not clear but the Los Angeles Times has disclosed that Colson did put Treasury Sec. John Connally up to holding his press conference and unleashing his vicious personal attack against Meany.

THE LINE which White House aides are peddling is that the delegates to the convention acted coldly but that only Meany was off base. This is the theme which Colson is pushing.

With too many reputable newspapers, magazines and commentators accepting this mythical version, the record should be straightened by an on-the-scene eyewitness:

Playing "Hail to the Chief"—The convention had a band the first day and Meany offered Nixon time at 4 p.m.

Nixon, however, chose to speak the second day when only chamber music was provided. A pianist and two violinists cannot very well play "Hail to the Chief."

Cursory Introduction—Meany gave the precise introduction to Nixon that is traditionally given the chief executive: "Ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States."

The Nixon Chair—Nixon was not placed in the second row. He was placed to the rear and to the right where he could be introduced and Meany could turn and extend his right hand.

It was the same chair that every President since Harry Truman has used at AFL or AFL-CIO conventions.

Leaving the Hall—Meany carefully waited until Nixon had left the hall before he called the convention to order.

Many observers are convinced that Nixon, himself, exhibited rudeness when he plunged into the delegates and upset the convention. No other President has done that.

It was after this that Meany said, "We will now proceed with Act II."

CONSUMERS may have a good year in Congress, but they'll not fare as well in the marketplace under Pres. Nixon's Phase 2 price controls, Ladies' Garment Workers Legislative Rep. Evelyn Dubrow predicted on Labor News Conference. Questioning her on the AFL-CIO interview on Mutual radio were Frank Swoboda, left, of Business Week magazine and Duane Emme of Press Associates, Inc.

Key House Vote on Election Reform

The House on Nov. 30 voted 233-147 approval of a labor-supported amendment proposed by Rep. Orval Hansen (R-Idaho) to the election reform bill. It clarifies court rulings to make it clear that unions have the right to spend funds from dues income to communicate with members and conduct non-partisan get-out-the-vote campaigns aimed at union members and their families.

If the Hansen amendment had been defeated, Rep. Philip M. Crane (R-Ill.) had planned to offer an amendment that would have severely limited the political rights of unions.

On labor's scoreboard, the 182 Democrats and 51 Republicans who voted for the Hansen amendment were Right (R). The 38 Democrats and 109 Republicans opposed cast Wrong votes (W). Absentees are designated (A). Numerals show congressional districts.

Valuable Data Gathered:

'70 Census Reveals Shifting U.S. Trends

The 1970 census revealed much more than that the center of the nation's population continued to shift southwestward and that 203,184,772 noses were counted, an article in the November issue of Federationist magazine points out.

The census turned up a great deal about the "average" American—the kind of job he's likely to hold, his median income, changes in his living conditions—and about the country's shifting trends that will affect him in the future, author Alexander Uhl notes.

"Only 13 states increased their portion of the population between 1960 and 1970," Uhl observes, "and not one of them was in the North Central area." This had been the No. 1 population region during the industrialization boom.

Uhl says the more significant trend coming from the '70 census was the great change in the population pattern of the cities and their suburbs.

Virtually every large metropolitan area in the country showed population gains between 1960 and 1970. But almost invariably, the growth was in the suburbs while the inner core cities lost population.

Although there are now 153 cities in the United States with a population of 100,000 or more, Uhl notes that "the percentage of the nation's population living in them has been dropping for the past 40 years."

These 150 cities account for 27.6 percent of the nation's population.

Uhl says it is misleading to make a sharp distinction between "city" and "suburb" and that the focus should be on "urbanized" areas, which include both city and suburbs. These urbanized areas are highly integrated economically and often, socially and culturally.

There are some 248 urbanized areas in the United States with populations of 50,000 or more, he reports. These areas have a combined population of 118 million, or about 58 percent of the nation's total.

The largest is the New York-Northern New Jersey area with 16.2 million persons. Los Angeles-Long Beach ranks second with 8.3 million and Chicago now is third with 6.7 million.

"In all, there are now 25 American urbanized areas with populations of 1 million or more," Uhl reports. They range from the 16.2 million in New York to a little more than 1 million in San Jose, Calif.

While the U.S. population climbed from 179.3 million in 1960 to 203.1 million in 1970, the nation's labor force expanded from 72 million to 86 million with more than 90 percent of the jobs held in nonagricultural industries and services, he reports.

Agricultural employment continued to drop during the 10-year span, although at a slower pace than in previous decades, Uhl notes.

But jobs in manufacturing, mining, transportation and public utilities also dropped during the decade.

Uhl points out that "between 1960 and 1970, the number of jobs in mining dropped from 1.3 million to 900,000; in manufacturing, from 31 million to 28.7 million, and in transportation and public utilities, from 7.4 million to 6.3 million."

Wholesale and retail trade declined about 200,000 to 20.9 million and contract construction slipped from 5.3 million to 4.9 million, Uhl reports.

On the up side were jobs in insurance, finance and real estate, rising from 4.9 million to 5.1 million; services rose from 13.7 million to 15.8 million.

Another big gainer was government employment—federal, state and local—which boomed from 15.4 million to 17 million, Uhl notes.

"What was striking about the labor force was the rapid increase of married women in the labor market as compared with single women," he stresses.

"In 1960, some 5.4 million single women were without jobs. By the end of 1969, there were 6.5 million. On the other hand, the number of married women who had jobs shot up from 13.5 million in 1960 to 19.1 million in 1970.

"As a percentage of women in the labor force, married women plus widowed and divorced had far exceeded single women—78.3 percent to 21.7 percent."

Moonlighting has also become a way of life for millions of Americans, he observes, as the number of workers who held more than one job rose from 2.4 million in 1960 to 3.3 million in 1970.

The average American family in 1970 was composed of a husband, wife and two children in their late teens.

The median family income was $9,870 in 1970, compared with $3,000 in 1950. However, Uhl points out that the figures are deceptive.

"Increases in the cost of living have deeply eroded the incomes boosts," Uhl says as he cites Census Bureau adjustments for inflation which show that median real income in 1970 was $6,100—about double the 1950 real income of $3,300. He stresses, too, that "this doubling of real income in greater measure rests on the fact that an increasing number of wives are entering the labor market and thus adding to the family income."

High Court Denies Right of Unions To Bargain for Retired Workers

ground that retired workers do not come under the Taft-Hartley Act's definition of "employe," and that therefore the company did not violate the act by unilaterally adjusting benefits.

The NLRB, itself, with one member dissenting, reversed the trial examiner's conclusions, but the Sixth Circuit decided unanimously that the trial examiner was right.

The appellate court held that retired workers and pensioners are no longer employes for the purposes of the act and that an employer is under "no constraint to collectively bargain improvements in their benefits with the union" representing active employes.

In a friend-of-the-court brief filed with the Supreme Court, the AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers called the appellate court's decision unsound because it relieved the employer of his duty to bargain.

If the ruling gains acceptance, the federation argued, "countless subjects . . . important to labor and management will be removed from the bargaining table if either side declines to discuss them."

But the Supreme Court upheld the lower court's ruling. In holding that retirees are not protected by the labor act and cannot be considered members of the bargaining unit, the high court said that "even if an industry practice of bargaining over retirees' rights exists . . . that cannot change the law . . . ."

And even though the Taft Act forbids mid-term modification of contracts, the Supreme Court ruled that Pittsburgh Plate Glass was not guilty of an unfair labor practice by modifying benefits for retirees because "it related to a permissive rather than a mandatory subject of bargaining."

Such an action, however, might amount to a breach of contract the court said.

"When a union bargains for retirees—which nothing in this opinion precludes if the employer agrees—the retirees are not without protection. Under established contract principles, vested retirement rights may not be altered without the pensioner's consent," the court noted.

"Retirees, moreover, would have a federal remedy under . . . the Labor Management Relations Act for breach of contract if their benefits were unilaterally changed . . . ."

Another Supreme Court decision undercut the rights of unions to settle jurisdictional disputes among themselves.

The court ruled unanimously that the NLRB may impose a settlement of a union jurisdictional dispute when an employer refuses to accept a settlement already agreed to by the unions.

The issue grew out of a dispute between a Plasterers local and the Tile, Terrazzo & Marble Setters over who would apply mortar to walls on a job at the University of Houston library.

The two unions took the matter to the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.'s National Joint Board for Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes.

The board awarded the work to the Plasterers, and the Tile Setters accepted the decision. But the contractors did not like the designation and took the case to the NLRB, which awarded the work in the employer's favor.

The Plasterers and the AFL-CIO, in a brief submitted to the Supreme Court, argued that a jurisdictional settlement by two unions could not be set aside simply because an employer "has not consented to be bound" by the inter-union procedure.

An appeals court set the NLRB decision aside on the ground that only the unions were involved in the dispute, but the Supreme Court said the employer, picketed to force reassignment of work, was a party and that the NLRB must hear such cases with the employer having a voice in the hearing.

Justice Byron White's opinion held that in this case the employer had a definite stake in the outcome of the dispute and must be considered a party to it, thus giving the NLRB the authority to award the work at issue.

In other action, the Supreme Court:

- Ruled 5-2 that a federal court, on request of the NLRB, has the power to block a state court order regulating peaceful picketing. The case involved the Jack & Jill Stores in Grand Island, Neb., the subject of an unfair labor practice charge by the Meat Cutters who were organizing the chain in 1968. An NLRB trial examiner ruled in favor of the union, but the employer obtained a state court injunction against resultant picketing.
- Agreed to decide whether it is the province of a court or an arbitrator to decide whether a claim of contract violation brought by a union two years after the fact is too stale to be the subject of arbitration. The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals split on the question of whether Operating Engineers Local 150 had waited too long on enforcement of a contract with the Flair Builders Inc. of Sugar Grove, Ill.

Sheinkman Reappointed To Welfare Plan Panel

Jacob Sheinkman, a vice president and general counsel of the Clothing Workers, was reappointed to a two-year term on the Advisory Council on Employe Welfare & Pension Benefit Plans.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson also announced the appointment of Willard E. Solenberger of the Auto Workers to the council.

Nixon Pension 'Reform' Scored as Boon to Rich

ment investment accounts. Their only lack would be the money to do so.

Under the Administration proposal, self-employed persons would be able to claim a much bigger tax exemption on money they tuck away into retirement investments than permitted under an already-generous present law.

Instead of avoiding taxes on 10 percent of their income up to a ceiling of $2,500 a year, they would be able to claim a tax deduction on 15 percent of their income up to $7,500 a year.

The intent, Nixon told Congress, is to "reward and reinforce" the qualities of "self-reliance, prudence and independence" in the American people.

The Administration proposal would allow employes—those who are not self-employed—to make tax-free contributions of up to $1,500 a year to their own retirement plan. But if they are covered by an employer-financed plan, the President's message said, "the upper limit of $1,500 would be reduced to reflect pension plan contributions made by the employer."

One of the Administration's proposals would deal with the thorny problem of pension vesting—but could pose new problems by ignoring the distinction between single-employer plans and industry multi-employer plans that preserve benefits when jobs are shifted.

The President asked that vesting of 50 percent of earned benefits be mandatory when the combination of age plus years of service equals 50. The employe would receive an additional 10 percent vesting right for each year beyond that. Employers would be permitted to impose a three-year waiting period before participation in a pension plan begins and would not be required to cover employes who are within five years of normal retirement age.

As for the pressing problem of a guarantee that workers will get the benefits promised them when they retire, the President's solution was to direct the Labor Dept. and Treasury Dept. to undertake a one-year study.

A study is necessary, the President claimed, because "the number of workers affected and the degree to which they are harmed are unknown."

A White House aide told newsmen that only a very small number of workers lose benefits because pension promises aren't kept.

Action Called 'Indefensible':

Nixon's Veto Scraps Child Care Program

would lead toward altering the family relationship."

And later in his veto message, Nixon went even further down the extremist road:

"For the federal government to plunge headlong financially into supporting child development would commit the vast moral authority of the national government to the side of communal approaches to child rearing over against the family-centered approach."

The President reiterated his assertion that his welfare proposals would adequately take care of poverty-level mothers who need a place to park their children while they work.

Kirkland retorted that the President's veto "has made it clear that he is not really interested in the child; his chief concern is with a cheap, baby-sitting operation for the children of welfare mothers and the working poor."

The legislation Congress enacted "was of major social benefit to millions of Americans and their children," Kirkland said. "The President has denied this benefit by his crass political action."

The veto also killed, as part of the same bill, a two-year extension of the anti-poverty programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity and a new, politics-free legal services program for the poor.

Nixon found fault with all of these programs, although that part of the bill had been widely assumed to be acceptable to the Administration.

The final version of the child care legislation was passed by the Senate on a 63-17 vote—with more than two-thirds of Senate Republicans present joining the bulk of Democrats in supporting the measure.

But the House vote of 210-186 was substantially short of the two-thirds majority that would be needed to override a veto. Voting for the bill were 179 Democrats and 31 Republicans; opposed were 134 Republicans and 52 Democrats.

Ironically, the wild scare about the destruction of family life was a source of embarrassment to most opponents of the bill during the House debate.

They based their case on traditional grounds of costs and bypassing of states in favor of cities, and squirmed when a handful of far-out colleagues spoke darkly of a generation of children being taken away from their parents and brainwashed by the government with all sorts of pyschological tests and drugs.

Thus, Rep. John R. Rarick (D-La.) told the House in all apparent seriousness that the program would lead to the "ultimate destruction of the family." Its goal, he said, "is a planned collectivist society similar to that of Soviet Russia, Red China, and the kibbutzim of Israel."

In fact, as AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller pointed out in a letter to all congressmen, there was nothing "mandatory" about the program.

If enacted, it would have meant "for the first time, comprehensive day care would be available for the children of parents who want something better than custodial care—or no care at all—for their children."

It would have offered education, health and nutrition services to children through locally-sponsored child care centers.

Meany Praises Bunche's Service

New York—Dr. Ralph Bunche, who attained the highest post in the United Nations ever held by an American official, died here Dec. 9 after a long illness.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who served two terms on the U.S. delegation to the United Nations, said Bunche's death meant that "the cause of world peace has lost one of its foremost advocates."

"Ralph Bunche served the United Nations and all the people of the world wtih devotion and skill," Meany said.

URW Ad Challenges Charge of Disrespect

Akron, O.—In an effort to tell "what really happened" when Pres. Nixon addressed the AFL-CIO convention in Bal Harbour, Fla., the Rubber Workers bought a full page advertisement in a recent issue of the Akron Beacon Journal, the parent newspaper of the highly-profitable Knight newspaper chain.

The ad drew praise from many URW members and from elements of the general public who had previously read only the distorted accounts of the President's appearance in the Beacon Journal news and editorial pages.

"When we returned from the convention, a check showed that the Beacon Journal, along with many other newspapers and radio and television newscasters had been disseminating hundreds of words slanted to make people believe that the President had been treated rudely or discourteously by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the delegates," URW Pres. Peter Bommarito said in explaining the decision to run the ad.

The introductory paragraph of the ad charged that "outright distortion" of the event "has been rampant in the commercial press and on television and radio news shows."

"Believing in the public's right to know what really happened, we are presenting the verbatim text of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's remarks to the convention on Monday, Nov. 22, 1971."

The text of Meany's remarks was published in full.

"We felt these comments best told the story," Bommarito said. "He made it perfectly clear that there was no booing, no jeering and that there was respect shown at all times for the office of the President and for the man who holds that office."

"News reports and letters to the editor in the Beacon Journal and other papers were based on the false premise that there had been discourtesy shown when the opposite was true and we wanted to do our part in trying to set the record straight," Bommarito explained.

He charged that "The Beacon Journal and other Knight newspapers, including the Miami Herald, seemed deliberately committed to a course of making Pres. Meany out as a villain and the delegates as uncouth clods."

The advertisement, which pointed out that it was being presented as a public service by the URW, wound up with this challenge:

"'We who were there challenge any member of the news media or White House staff to produce any television tapes, tape recordings or verbatim transcripts to contradict these facts. . . ."

Bommarito said:

"We haven't had any takers on that challenge—not even from the White House, and that challenge still stands."

Federal Salary Lag Held 6.6% As of Last June

White-collar employes of the federal government would need a "comparability" pay raise averaging 6.6 percent just to bring them up to private industry levels of last June, according to a government survey.

But it is still uncertain when they will get their raise and how much they will be allowed to receive.

The salary data gathered by the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed the largest year-to-year increase in private industry white collar scales in the 11 years the survey has been conducted. Between June of 1970 and the same month in 1971, the average of clerical salaries rose 6.5 percent and the average in the professional, administrative and technical categories increased 6.7 percent.

Normally, that would be reflected in an automatic adjustment of government salaries in January. But Pres. Nixon last fall ordered the postponement of the pay adjustments an additional six months—until next July 1. At that time, federal employes would be a full year behind the private sector.

The Senate, however, voted an amendment to the Economic Stabilization Act extension that would reinstate the Jan. 1 date for the pay raise. It would, however, limit the amount to the Pay Board's 5.5 percent guideline. The House has not yet acted on the bill.

The BLS survey included these typical year-to-year salary increases: typists, 6.1 percent; stenographers, 7.4 percent; secretaries, 6.5 percent; keypunch operators, 7 percent; engineers, 5.7 percent; accountants, 6.7 percent—and directors of personnel, 8 percent.

Labor Advisers Denounce Proposal To Drop BLS City Family Budgets

A trade union advisory committee to the Bureau of Labor Statistics has strongly urged the BLS to continue its compilation of family budgets for city workers.

The BLS budgets show the annual income needed in various cities for a family of four to maintain living standards described as "lower," "moderate" and "higher."

To the Administration's apparent embarrassment, the BLS data also reveals that the average worker's income is far short of the amount needed for a "moderate" standard of living—and the average production worker employed the year around doesn't earn enough for even the austere lower budget.

The last compilation, based on price levels in the spring of 1970, showed that a family with two children and a nonworking wife needed a national city average of $10,664 for the moderate budget, $6,960 for the bare-bones lower budget, and $15,511 for a higher living standard that is still far removed from luxury. All these amounts would, of course, be higher at today's living costs.

If Commissioner of Labor Statistics Geoffrey H. Moore goes ahead with the "proposal" he made to the labor and business advisory committees to the BLS, the city worker budgets would be discontinued.

Instead, the BLS would substitute data showing how families at different income levels in different cities actually spend their money.

Although the BLS began its budget estimates in 1946 at the urging of a congressional committee, Moore argued there is really no way for the government to determine how much income a family actually needs and how its income should be spent.

His proposal to drop the budget compilation came only a short time after the BLS announced discontinuance of another government survey—the quarterly reports on unemployment in poor inner city neighborhoods.

Rudolph Oswald, AFL-CIO economist who serves as chairman of the Labor Research Advisory Council to the BLS, said Moore met with the council's Committee on Prices & Living Conditions to discuss his proposal to drop the city worker family budgets.

Oswald said the committee, headed by Lazare Teper, research director of the Ladies' Garment Workers, expressed its strong opposition to the proposal. The meeting, at which labor's disapproval was made clear, was held more than a week before Moore publicly announced that the plan to discontinue the budget studies was being submitted to the advisory panels.

A member of the committee, AFL-CIO Economist Anne Draper, said discontinuance of the family budgets would leave the "poverty level" as determined by the Census Bureau as the only remaining official government standard of "income adequacy."

If this is done, she said, "it will be difficult to escape the suspicion that a politically-motivated, business-oriented Republican Administration hopes to stifle the aspirations of the poor, the near-poor, and the ordinary working man toward a better life by removing all visible targets beyond the poverty line from official government statistics."

Ellen Lutz Rallies To Her Grandfather

The following letter to the editor appeared in the Dec. 5, 1971 edition of The Washington Post under the headline "For a Good Grandfather."

"You have put a lot of cartoons of George Meany in your paper. Most of them I did not like. And some of them were very funny. The reason I wrote you was because I am George Meany's granddaughter. And he is a very nice man. And a very good grandfather. Ellen Lutz."

White House Attack Refuted In Roanoke Ad

Roanoke, Va. — The Roanoke Central Labor Council passed the hat among local union members to pay for advertisements in two daily newspapers here.

The ads appeared in the Roanoke Times and the World-News under the heading: "Who's Out of Step with Labor's Rank and File? Nixon or Meany."

"Would you believe that the hometown fans could cheer and praise the quarterback that had fumbled three times, threw five interceptions and run the wrong way for a touchdown? Of course not. Neither could the delegates to the AFL-CIO convention cheer Mr. Nixon," the ads said.

"George Meany is not out of step with labor's rank and file. Mr. Nixon has called too many wrong plays in his game plan and we need a new signal caller."

Congress Vote Clears Way For Retroactive Pay Hikes

Up to 13 More Weeks:

High Jobless Areas Get Added Benefits

Workers in states with the heaviest unemployment rates will be able to draw up to 13 weeks of additional jobless benefits if Pres. Nixon signs a bill passed in the closing days of the session.

In its final form, the legislation emerged as a half-loaf version of a bill twice passed by the Senate with bipartisan support.

The House approved the compromise measure on a 194-149 roll-call that found the two senior mem- of the Ways & Means Committee in opposite camps. Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) steered the measure to passage; Rep. John W. Byrnes (R-Wis.), the ranking minority member, fought unsuccessfully to kill it.

Original sponsor of the measure —in the broader version adopted by the Senate—was Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), whose state has a large number of men and women who are being dumped on the welfare rolls each week because their unemployment benefits have been exhausted.

Under the Senate version, after using up their 26 weeks of regular state benefits and 13 weeks under the present extended benefit program, they would have been able to draw up to 26 weeks of further benefits under the new program to a total of 64 weeks.

The final form of the bill limits the new benefits to 13 weeks, for an overall maximum of one year of state and federal benefits.

Furthermore, the legislation was made temporary with no new benefit period allowed to start after July 1 and with the program to close down by Oct. 1.

Foreign Aid Fight Stalls Adjournment

The first session of the 92nd Congress sputtered toward a close, but a Senate hassle over stopgap appropriations for the foreign aid program pushed back the adjournment timetable.

Congress put on its usual end-of-the-session burst of activity, approving dozens of bills and conference reports—with perfunctory debate sometimes shortened by impatient calls from the floor of "Vote!"

In a more leisurely interlude, the House and Senate discussed and savored a solution to the land claims of Alaska's native Eskimos, Indians and Aleuts—an issue dating from the 1876 purchase of the territory from Russia and intensified by the granting of statehood in 1959 and the subsequent discovery of important oil reserves.

The House-Senate conference committee report, deemed generally

Machinists' Settlements:

200,000 Win Gains In Aerospace Pacts

Wage increases totaling 18 percent over three years and an uncapped cost-of-living clause have been won by the Machinists on behalf of 200,000 aerospace workers at plants of the McDonnell-Douglas Corp., Lockheed and Boeing.

The ratified agreements now must clear the Pay Board, which has postponed action on the pacts as well as one for IAM members at United Aircraft in Connecticut. In the United contract, the union won wage gains totaling 14 percent over three years in increments of 8 percent, 3 percent and 3 percent, with a 2.5 percent ceiling on cost-of-living adjustments in the last two years of the contract.

The other agreements call for three annual wage increases—12 percent, 3 percent, 3 percent—with no lid on the cost-of-living escalator, one of the Machinists' major bargaining goals in this year's talks.

Another long-sought goal realized this year was a full union shop clause requiring all employes to join the union within 40 days of ratification of the contract. At Lockheed, however, the union security agreement includes a "grandfather clause." It provides that all persons hired after July 24, 1971, the expiration date of the last contract, must become union members.

The Lockheed contract also provides for the first dental plan for employes, but details remain to be worked out.

Okays Jan. 1 Government Salary Raise

By David L. Perlman

Congress has ordered retroactive payment of virtually all pay and benefit increases that were denied workers during the 90-day wage freeze.

It also, as part of a one-year extension of the President's economic stabilization powers, approved a 5.5 percent raise for federal employes on Jan. 1. That's the date they had originally been scheduled to receive "comparability" increases. But Pres. Nixon had ordered the raises deferred until next July 1—so that federal employes would "set an example" for the rest of the nation.

In other areas, too, Congress expressed its concern at inequities and loopholes in the existing stabilization program.

Thus, it directed that interest rates be controlled whenever wages and prices are restricted—unless the President determines that it shouldn't be done and announces his reasons. It authorized suits for triple the amount of deliberate price overcharges. And it insisted on Senate confirmation for the incumbent chairmen of the Pay Board and Price Commission.

At stake in the retroactivity battle was whether contracts negotiated before the freeze by unions and management should be honored—or whether employers should be permitted to pocket the money that was withheld from workers between Aug. 15 and Nov. 14.

In the space of five days, the signal for retroactivity flickered rapidly on and off—and finally stayed green.

Profits 'Guideline' Leaves Room for Sharp Increase

Despite Phase 2 guidelines on prices, a business forecast in the Outlook column of the Wall Street Journal suggests that a sharp increase in profits could result from price increases with no violation of the guideline.

A pre-tax profit regulation of the President's new economic policy decrees that "price adjustments shall not result in an increase" in a firm's pre-tax profit margin above the average recorded in any two of the last three fiscal years.

"At first glance, this rule may seem to place an uncomfortable lid on profit growth," the article notes. "But this is hardly the case."

Overall corporate profit margins in 1968 and 1969, the best two of the past three calendar years, averaged 6.2 percent, or 25 percent above current levels.

The Journal article, quoting an economist for a New York securities firm, says that when this 25 percent allowable increase is added to projected gains in corporate sales, a 40 percent rise in pre-tax profits could occur with no violation of Phase 2 regulations.

U.S. Standards Pressed For Job Injury Benefits

The workmen's compensation program will meet the needs of modern industrial society only when the federal government assumes the responsibility for the welfare of the injured worker and his family, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told a federal panel.

In a statement to the National Commission on State Workmen's Compensation Laws, Seidman urged that the millions of American workers now unprotected be brought under workmen's compensation programs and that weekly benefits be brought to a level "sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living for injured workers and their dependents."

The commission was established by the Occupational Safety & Health Act to evaluate the adequacy of state workmen's compensation laws. Its findings will be reported to the President and Congress along with recommendations for improvements.

Grants Renew Outreach Job Training Plans

Eight apprenticeship and journeyman training projects were renewed by the Labor Dept. to prepare 1,760 minority workers for jobs in the building and construction trades.

The contracts carry grants totalling $2,538,065 from the Manpower Administration to the sponsors.

The largest contract, for $2,128,147, goes to the Workers' Defense League-Randolph Fund to place 1,170 apprentices in 17 cities and 330 journeymen in 10 cities. Under its previous contract, the league placed 997 apprentices and 361 journeymen to top its combined goal of 1,025 by 333.

Other contracts go to the Harrisburg, Pa., Building & Construction Trades Council, $49,880 for 30 apprentices; South Texas BCTC, $40,393 for 30 apprentices in the Corpus Christi area; Knoxville, Tenn. BCTC, $52,970 for 30 apprentices; Central & Western BCTC, $54,306 for 30 apprentices; Topeka, Kan., BCTC, $55,549 for 30 apprentices; Philadelphia Negro Trade Union Leadership Council, $114,649 for 80 apprentices, and the Norfolk, Va., BCTC, $46,126 for 30 apprentices.

Over the past 3.5 years, the Labor Dept. reported that the 101 apprenticeship outreach and journeyman training programs throughout the nation placed more than 13,500 minority workers.

Students Switch Stand On 'Rudeness' to Nixon

Can the unvarnished truth overcome distorted impressions about Pres. Nixon's reception by the AFL-CIO Convention?

An experiment at a suburban Washington junior high school shows that it can.

On the basis of what they saw on television and read in the newspapers, members of an eighth-grade English class voted 21 to 8 that labor had treated the President discourteously.

After listening carefully to an unedited sound tape of the proceedings, the impression was reversed. The students voted 21 to 8 that the charges of rudeness were false.

Similar tapes are available to unions and central bodies from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations.

IUD Turns to Computer To Build Trade Record

A detailed picture of job losses to U.S. workers due to the flight of American capital and technology abroad is now under preparation by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The IUD, which for the past five years has been developing an extensive computer service for use in organizing, National Labor Relations Board elections and pension bargaining, is expanding its computer program "to trace the geographical movements of U.S. corporations and their products."

"The goal," the IUD said, "is to build a historical file of corporate activity as it affects the employment and security of thousands of union members."

The department said it is calling on its affiliates to provide detailed information on:

- Plants that have gone out of business because of the competition of imported goods.
- Plants that undergo partial closings or significant, permanent curtailment of production for any reason.
- Plants that have shifted geographically to take advantage of cheap labor.
- Multinational companies that have bought foreign firms which then produce products with low-paid labor that compete with U.S.-produced goods.

One of the key uses to which the information will be put, the IUD said, will be to present to Congress a picture of the changing nature of foreign trade and point up the need for legislation to control the flight of American capital and technology abroad.

"The United States has the freest market in the world," said IUD Administrative Director Jacob Clayman, who pointed out that many countries which are criticizing the United States for looking toward trade controls actually have strict controls of their own.

Commission Told:

State Injury Laws 'Shocking Failure'

fight for federal standards as the American Insurance Association, which represents major stock insurance funds in the United States, told the commission that it, too, favors federal guidelines.

The organization urged the commission to recommend many of the same proposals long sought by labor.

Seidman told the commission that the weekly benefit level must be brought to at least two-thirds of the injured worker's average weekly wage.

"It is the shame of the workmen's compensation system that sub-poverty benefits are commonplace today," Seidman said. He noted that the government considers a non-farm four-member family to be poor, or below the poverty level, if its annual net income does not exceed $3,800, or $78.88 a week.

But even taking into account legislation that will become effective in January, 26 state programs fail to provide maximum weekly benefits equal to the poverty level of income, Seidman pointed out.

The original goal of workmen's compensation was to restore to injured workers at least two-thirds of the wages lost because of industrial injuries.

The gap between this objective and what the state laws actually provide is one of the most serious inadeqacies of the present system, Seidman said.

"The state programs," he declared, "have failed to respond to the economic changes that have taken place in the past 60 years."

And, he charged, "This shocking failure . . . is directly attributable, in our opinion, to the lack of federal standards for the program."

Seidman cited Labor Dept. statistics showing that since 1940, the ratio of workmen's compensation benefits to average weekly wages has declined in 47 states.

He called for establishment of minimum federal standards through legislation introduced by Rep. Carl Perkins (D-Ky.).

This bill would extend the provisions of the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act to many workers by requiring that employers engaged in commerce secure insurance providing protections not less than those of the Longshoremen's Act.

In addition, the AFL-CIO urged the commission to recommend a number of other federal standards, such as full medical benefits for job-incurred personal injuries and occupational diseases, full statutory coverage of all occupational diseases and free choice of qualified physician by injured workers.

Seidman also pointed to the need to give workmen's compensation agencies the authority to supervise and control medical care.

The statement also proposed that an employe should have one year to file a claim on occupational diseases and that in case of death, benefits should be paid his widow until her death or remarriage and to his children until the age of 18.

Other measures urged by the federation include:

- Payment of double benefits in the case of minors injured on a job where they were employed illegally.
- Prohibition of special contracts whereby an employe with a specific physical defect waives his right to compensation.
- Prohibition of lump-sum settlement and compromise of rights to full medical care unless the agency approves such a settlement.

Labor members of the commission are James O'Brien, also an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, and Michael Peevey, research director for the California AFL-CIO.

Stewardesses Retain Full Rights on Marriage

Airlines can't ground stewardesses because they are married, the Supreme Court agreed as it left standing a lower court ruling that United Air Lines policy violated the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Although United dropped its no-marriage policy for stewardesses in 1968, the airline appealed the decision of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upholding a ruling of the U.S. District Court in Chicago. The district court found the airline guilty of sex discrimination under Title VII of the Act.

The suit was filed against United by Mrs. Mary Burke Sprogis, whose job as a United stewardess was terminated after her marriage in 1966. Mrs. Sprogis has been a leader of the Air Line Pilots' stewards and stewardesses division.

District Judge Joseph Sam Perry ruled that Mrs. Sprogis was entitled to reinstatement as a stewardess with back pay for loss of earnings. The court also retained jurisdiction to determine whether other fired stewardesses should receive relief because of dismissal under the company's policy banning marriage.

The appeals court held that since the airline's policy on marital-status did not apply equally to male employes, it violated the Civil Rights Act. It further noted the requirement that stewardesses be female and unmarried was not a bona fide qualification for the job.

In other actions, the high court also denied review of a decision that newspaper distributors are not "independent contractors," but employes of the publisher entitled to the protections of the National Labor Relations Act, including the right to union representation.

The case involved the Herald Co. of Syracuse, N.Y., of the Newhouse Newspapers chain. The company had claimed it operated a "franchise system" with the distributors.

A National Labor Relations Board regional director found during an organizing drive by the Service Employes that the company maintained effective control over the distributors, and held they were employes—not independent contractors.

The SEIU won an NLRB representation election and was certified as the bargaining agent for the distributors, but the company refused to bargain with the union.

The labor board later found that the company had failed to recognize the union, had illegally refused to bargain and had fired 12 distributors in an attempt to discourage union activity.

An NLRB order to bargain and to reinstate the 12 employes was upheld by the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals. The American Newspaper Publishers Association joined the Newhouse firm in its unsuccessful appeal to the Supreme Court.

The court also denied review of a ruling that employer contributions to a union-negotiated trust fund must be given the same priority as wages in bankruptcy proceedings.

The 9th Circuit Court in San Francisco held that an employer's unpaid contributions to the Bay Area Painters' vacation trust fund under a collective bargaining agreement have the priority standing as "wages . . . due to workmen" under the Bankruptcy Act.

Textile Workers Win Vote at Oneita Mills

Andrews, S.C. — The Textile Workers Union of America won collective bargaining rights for a unit of 720 employes at the Oneita Mills here.

The vote was 380 for the TWUA to 287 votes for no union. There were 22 challenged ballots with five being declared void.

New D.C. Jobless Benefits Law Offers Model for State Programs

Congress voted final approval to a model unemployment insurance law for the District of Columbia—setting benefits and coverage higher than all but a few states now provide.

The labor-supported measure pegs the ceiling on unemployment compensation to two-thirds of the average wage in covered employment.

When the law takes effect on Jan. 1, this will mean an immediate jump in maximum benefits from $73 to $98. As wage levels rise, the benefit ceiling will go up automatically. The current benefit ceiling is 50 percent of the average wage.

Only Hawaii and Arkansas presently have the two-thirds provision in their state laws, with Utah close behind at 65 percent of the state's average wage.

Of major importance, the D.C. law for the first time covers a large number of domestic employes—those who work in households that pay at least $500 a quarter in wages to one or more domestic workers.

New York and Hawaii are the only states that presently cover household employes.

The legislation also brings the nation's capital in line with the provisions of the federal extended benefits law, providing up to 39 weeks of payments during periods of high unemployment. When federal extended benefits are not payable, the District of Columbia program continues to cover up to 34 weeks of payments.

The new law doesn't come fully up to the standards that the AFL-CIO has urged. But it does meet the standards that Pres. Nixon and his predecessors in the White House have called on states to enact—with little results.

Significantly, for the first time it puts a congressional stamp of approval on these standards. That's because Congress acts in the role of a state legislature in governing the nation's capital.

Back in 1969, Nixon set a two-year time limit for states to meet his recommended standards of jobless benefits, "thereby averting the need for federal action."

But when AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reminded the President last summer that the deadline had expired and urged the Administration to call now for federal standards of unemployment compensation, there was no response from the White House.

The AFL-CIO has urged that individual benefits for the bulk of workers be two-thirds of lost wages—with the benefit ceiling raised sufficiently to bring this about. No state, however, has gone significantly above the customary 50 percent of wages up to a specified maximum.

The District of Columbia law actually is among the better in the nation. It provides a weekly benefit based on 1/23 of quarterly earnings—permitting slightly above 50 percent for persons who had been steadily employed. It also adds to this an allowance of $1 a week for each dependent, up to three. That provision is unchanged in the new law.

Labor, the District of Columbia government and the Administration testified in favor of the improvements that were enacted by Congress, but employer groups opposed the higher benefit ceiling as "out-of-line" with maximum benefits paid by the adjoining states of Maryland and Virginia.

In the adjournment rush of Congress, however, the bill was steered to quick passage in the Senate. And the House—on the day it sets aside to consider legislation affecting the nation's capital — routinely approved the Senate bill intact by a voice vote.

For Past Two Years:

Pay Board Clears Signalmen's Terms

The tripartite Pay Board gave approval to part of the 46 percent wage settlement won by the Brotherhood of Railway Signalmen, allowing the 11.9 percent already in effect and a total of 11.5 percent more in retroactive increases for 13,000 workers covered by the union's contract.

In addition to the 11.9 percent increase granted the Signalmen by Congress when it ordered them to end a strike last May, the Pay Board approved retroactive raises of 2.6 percent as of Jan. 1, 1971, 2.9 percent effective Apr. 1, 1971, and 5 percent Oct. 1 of this year.

The board stipulated, however, that 5 percent increases due Apr. 1 and Oct. 1, 1972, and Apr. 1, 1973, must be resubmitted then for further consideration.

The Signalmen were without a contract for 25 months, and their new pact runs from Jan. 1, 1970 to Apr. 1, 1973.

"The terms of this agreement provide for increases over the past two years of substantially the same amounts either legislated by the Congress or recommended by Presidential Emergency Boards," the Pay Board said in approving the agreement.

The board said it considered the part of the contract effective after the freeze period ended Nov. 13 as a "new agreement."

In other action, the Pay Board deferred a decision on an Auto Workers settlement for its members employed by North American Rockwell. The three-year contract calls for a 12 percent wage boost in the first year, and 3 percent increases in the second and third years.

This is substantially the same settlement reached by the Machinists on behalf of workers at Boeing, Lockheed and McDonnell-Douglas Corp.

Nearly 250,000 aerospace workers are involved, with the Machinists representing most of them. By a 9-5 vote—the labor members all opposed—the Pay Board decided to wait until all the contracts come up for consideration.

The board's five business members and four public representatives voted for the postponement with Chairman George H. Boldt abstaining, as he usually does except in the case of tie votes.

Boldt said last week that the board's staff is reviewing its existing and proposed regulations "to assure that they will be consonant with provisions contained in the Stabilization Act Amendments passed by the Congress and submitted to the President."

Boldt appointed, and the Pay Board unanimously approved, new top executives for the board. Named as executive director was Robert P. Tiernan, chief counsel in industrial personnel relations of the Kaiser Industries Corp. in Oakland, Calif. Appointed administrative director was Millard Cass, a retired deputy under secretary in the Labor Dept. who had been recently serving as administrative director of the Construction Industry Stabilization Commission.

Meanwhile, the Price Commission imposed a 2.5 percent ceiling on increases in doctors' fees and a 6 percent limit on increases in hospital charges.

The commission said that rates for medical services have been rising at an annual rate of 12.9 percent.

Doctors and hospitals will be required to maintain price lists disclosing any changes and to make these lists available to patients, a commission statement said.

A COALITION OF COMMUNITY and social action groups for the purpose of price monitoring is proposed by AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis to representatives of the NAACP Leadership Conference, the National Council of Negro Women, Americans for Indian Opportunity, the District of Columbia Spanish Community Advisory Committee, the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the National Urban League.

Price Watchdog Groups Stepping Up Activities

By Mike Bosch

Price monitoring by AFL-CIO sponsored consumer watchdog units is rapidly taking form across the country despite the hindrance of garbled guidelines and inadequate enforcement by the government agencies responsible for implementing Phase 2.

Central labor bodies from New York to Los Angeles have held watchdog training meetings with several drawing more than 1,000 participants.

Representatives of the Internal Revenue Service addressed a number of the meetings in an effort to explain Phase 2 regulations. But the vagueness of the IRS in answering questions about investigation and enforcement procedures left a sense of disappointment, central body officers reported.

At the St. Louis meeting, for example, the more than 350 participants from AFL-CIO unions, the Auto Workers and Teamsters were urged to join the watchdog effort because "we know companies cannot be trusted to police themselves and the IRS hasn't the expertise, manpower or commitment to do the job."

Protests also were mounting over IRS refusals to identify violators of Price Commission regulations—or even to disclose the nature of consumer complaints, whether or not they were valid and whether or not a price rollback was achieved.

Charging that it is impossible to know if price controls are working without this information, the District Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employes in New York filed suit against the IRS demanding that it make public the names and locations of price violators.

The suit was filed under the Freedom of Information Act which requires the government to grant reasonable access to information affecting the public interest.

New evidence that the price regulations are being widely ignored was presented by the New York Daily News, which reported that a random survey of 140 retailers in New York City disclosed that 109 of them did not have the consumer information forms that all retailers are required to make available.

The forms are requests for ceiling price information and are supposed to take the place of public price posting, which the Administration postponed until Jan. 1.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services said that even with the confusing guidelines and regulations issued by the government, more than 50 local central bodies have already organized and held watchdog training meetings and several hundred more are in the works.

Several price monitoring workshops have also been held at universities around the country.

Encouraged by large delegations of non-labor community groups who have attended the watchdog meetings, the AFL-CIO is forming a coalition of community and consumer organizations as a means of coordinating the price monitoring efforts of all the groups.

CSA Director Leo Perlis met recently with leaders of national Negro, Spanish and American Indian groups to launch the coalition.

Representatives of the NAACP, the Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, the A. Philip Randolph Institute, Americans for Indian Opportunity, and the District of Columbia Spanish Community Advisory Committee attended the meeting set up by CSA Field Rep. Harvey Anderson.

Pledging whatever assistance the AFL-CIO can provide, Perlis asked that local affiliates of the organizations be encouraged to work with local central labor bodies.

3 Unions Team To Win Brass Industry Gains

Coordinated bargaining by three unions won agreement on a three-year pact providing 75 cents an hour to 4,500 workers at seven plants of the Anaconda-American Brass Co. The agreement ended a one-week strike at six of the plants.

The pact may set a pattern for negotiations underway with the Revere and Chase Brass Companies and Canadian companies, involving 5,000 more employes.

The agreement covers workers employed at two Anaconda plants in Waterbury, Conn., where the Auto Workers have contracts; at Detroit, a UAW contract; at Buffalo, a Steelworkers pact; at Los Angeles, USWA; at Kenosha, Wis., a Machinists agreement, and at Ansonia, Conn., USWA.

Union spokesmen said the pact calls for a 50-cent hourly increase the first year, and 12.5 cents in each of the following years. It is retroactive to Oct. 1, and contains a 9 percent increase for skilled workers on Oct. 1, 1972.

Also included is an unlimited cost-of-living escalator clause.

The settlement was reached with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Services in Washington, D.C.

IAM Aerospace Pacts Win Gains for 200,000

Rockwell plants in Southern California, and workers there have ratified terms similar to those negotiated by the Machinists.

Another Machinists contract covering 20,000 additional McDonnell-Douglas workers in St. Louis is due to expire next Jan. 30, and negotiations are now under way.

Pension benefits in the ratified Machinists pacts will be improved from $6.25 to $8 a month for each year of service. Benefits for current retirees were increased from $6.25 to $7.25.

The McDonnell-Douglas settlement was the pacesetter for the Machinists. It provides a first year wage increase of 12 percent, or 51 cents an hour including 34 cents in "catch-up" cost-of-living adjustments retroactive to July 17, 1971. An across-the-board wage increase of 17 cents an hour would be effective Dec. 6, 1971.

The settlement ratified at Lockheed calls for the entire 51 cents to be made retroactive to July 17.

The additional 3 percent raises in all the pacts come on Sept. 18, 1972, and Sept. 17, 1973.

With the 8-cent-an-hour limit in the old cost-of-living clause removed by the new contract, workers would receive their first quarterly adjustment July 17, 1972.

Other provisions of the McDonnell-Douglas agreement include:

- A 12th paid holiday—United Nations Day—this year, and an increase to 13 paid holidays in 1973. All plants will be shut down between Christmas and New Year's Day beginning this year.
- Hospitalization improvements providing a fully paid semi-private room for 30 days and up to $60 a day for the following 335 days of illness. Laid-off employes will be eligible for health and medical benefits for the balance of the month in which they are furloughed and for the following month.
- Life insurance benefits ranging from $8,500 to $13,000 and accidental death and dismemberment benefits from $4,250 to $6,500.
- Dental plan improvements which—beginning in 1973—will pay 80 percent of dentist bills. The $25 annual deduction per person will be dropped.

McDonnell-Douglas workers covered by the Machinists' contract are at plants in Santa Monica and Torrence, Calif., and New Orleans. The Lockheed contract covers locations at Palmdale, Burbank and Sunnydale, Calif., and Marietta, Ga.

Boeing Workers are at plants in Seattle and Everett, Wash., Wichita, Kan., and Cape Kennedy, Fla.

SEIU Urges Exemption Of Pay for Health Jobs

The Service Employes, representing more than 150,000 employes in the health industry, urged that low-income workers in the health care field—employes making less than $3 an hour—be exempted from Pay Board wage controls.

"It is economically unsound and morally wrong to adopt an anti-inflation policy that will intensify the plight of the working poor," the union said in a recommendation to the Committee on the Health Services Industry, a Phase 2 advisory body.

The committee was established as part of the post-freeze operation to advise the Pay Board and the Cost of Living Council on how the President's economic programs can be applied in the health field.

The 21-member committee includes one representative of organized labor.

The Service Employes asked that state and local government hospital workers be exempted from wage controls, noting that 250,000 federal hospital workers have been made exempt.

While acknowledging that rising costs in health care have contributed to inflation, the union pointed out many jobs in the health care field are near the botton rung of the economic ladder.

"The perpetuation of substandard wages intensifies the poverty cycle," said the union. "No constructive economic goals are achieved by clamping a lid on substandard wages."

The union also stated that control of low wages through a formula based on productivity is not justified in the case of hospital workers.

"In the delivery of health care," the SEIU statement said, "the concept of productivity is subject to an almost infinite number of variables. There is certainly no consensus with respect to any objective techniques for the measurement of productivity in this industry."

The 150,000 health care employes represented by the SEIU include housekeeping attendants, kitchen and laundry workers, nurses' aides, orderlies and licensed practical nurses in hospitals and nursing homes.

Nixon on Child Care

PRES. NIXON'S veto of this far-reaching legislation is indefensible. At the very time that he is demanding that Congress pass a tax bill loaded with giveaways to the nation's giant corporations, he is denying federal help to the children of working people and to the poor.

There is no sound reason for vetoing this bill. No amount of rhetoric can disguise the Administration's political decision to appease the Republican party's extreme right wing.

The Administration has repeatedly committed itself to a program of decent day care for pre-school children. By his veto, the President has made it clear that he is not really interested in the child; his chief concern is with a cheap, baby-sitting operation for the children of welfare mothers and the working poor.

The legislation passed by the Congress was of major social benefit to millions of Americans—and to their children. The President has denied this benefit by his crass political action.

. . . AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland on Pres. Nixon's veto of the child care-OEO bill.

. . . and Taxes

THE CONFERENCE COMMITTEE report on the Administration's tax proposals would, if enacted, undermine the federal tax structure. Fairness to the individual taxpayer demands the defeat of this unconscionable redistribution of wealth to those who already have much.

The minuscule benefits to individual taxpayers provided in this bill are more than wiped out by the unwarranted expansion of tax loopholes for corporate America. Corporate income taxes, as a percentage of total income tax receipts, have been declining in recent years. This raid on the Treasury would add a further 15 to 20 percent tax cut for corporations.

The billions of dollars that will now go into corporate treasuries will be diverted from America's pressing public investment needs in schools, hospitals, medical facilities, housing, mass transit and pollution control.

While the individual taxpayers would be shouldering an increasing percentage of the tax burden, this measure offers meager sops in the form of increased personal exemptions and an increased standard deduction. But the American people deserve more than sops, they deserve true tax reform and tax justice.

The only other redeeming feature of this bill is the elimination of the excise tax on automobiles. But this benefit to taxpayers is not sufficient to gain acceptance of the entire package. The eliminaion of the auto excise tax—indeed, the elimination of all excise taxes which are only disguised sales taxes—could be easily accomplished in a separate bill after the present measure is defeated.

Tax justice must be the goal of the Congress. Tax folly, such as this measure, must be defeated and individual taxpayers spared the ignominy of further tax cuts for business at their expense.

No one should be deceived by the Madison Avenue gimmickry in the title. It will not develop jobs or revive America's badly depressed economy. All it would do is give public money to private corporations who certainly don't need a government handout.

A Word Edgewise:

Madison Ave. Christmas Virus Even Topples the Stout-Hearted

By John P. Roche

IT HIT SUDDENLY, without warning. One morning, a few days ago, I woke up feeling utterly lethargic; only with a great exercise of will power could I throw off the covers. (I wanted to pull them over my head.) All day long I dragged, having the curious sense that I had been run over by a truck. When I got back from the university, nothing interested me except going off to my study and secluding myself. I growled at my wife and snapped at my daughter—I just didn't want to see anybody.

The first thing that entered my mind was that I was sick. There is one of those mysterious viruses "going round," but it does not include among its symptoms an allergy to people. Just for luck, I took one of every miscellaneous pill in the medicine cabinet, plus half a dozen vitamin Cs, but still the malaise persisted. Basically I just wanted to hide, to hibernate. Was I going nuts?

One of the problems in worrying about going nuts is that it can drive you nuts. Fortunately I was delivered from my fears. As I was brooding, up the driveway from the school bus came our ebullient daughter singing a Christmas carol. A quick look at the calendar and my worries were over: I was suffering from my annual attack of the Christmas virus. This year it just caught me unprepared.

Over the years I have discovered that there is a sizable contingent of Christians who share this malady—to say nothing of the Jews, who really get whip-sawed. (The latter have compromised by converting Hanukkah into a form of Christmas, passing out presents, and the like.) The reasons vary and are hard to ascertain, but however occasioned there is a tremendous amount of psychic stress floating around. Psychiatrists do a land office business.

In my case, Christmas always seemed to involve visiting one of my parents in the hospital. Indeed, as I sit writing this I can recall the stale, acrid smell of the waiting room in the Long Island College Hospital on Hicks St. in Brooklyn. Although my father and mother died some years ago, I still keep expecting that telephone call. I once figured out that my father had been given the last rites of the church seven times: five around Christmas time.

Then there is the appalling commercialization which, while I make no claim to piety, I bitterly resent. The conversion of Christ's Mass into a mercantile orgy, with all the pressure that accompanies it, may do wonders for the gross national product, but esthetically it is a monstrosity.

And the worst of it is that, no matter how hard I try, no matter how many resolutions I make, I end up capitulating. What am I going to get my wife? My daughter? My in-laws?

IN RATIONAL ECONOMIC TERMS, they don't need anything particularly. But I don't want to be a spoil-sport, so off I go in search of something "nice," something "different." Something which in point of fact will probably be virtually useless. And as I do so, I get madder and madder because the boys on Madison Ave. are playing me like a salmon.

I suppose I could give my wife and daughter each a check, but I can visualize their response: that lazy lout doesn't care enough to get out and exercise his imagination.

In short, I am trapped in Christmas, and I suppose that the only solution (this side of alcoholism or retreating to a monastery) is to adopt the old political adage: if you can't beat 'em, join 'em. I'll try, but one thing will continue to eat at my ego: those sardonic chuckles on Madison Ave. as I dutifully join the herd of conformists and rush to the perfume counter.

Economic Justice for Negroes Top Labor-Civil Rights Goal

The following is excerpted from an address by Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., executive director-designate, National Urban League, to the recent AFL-CIO Convention in Bal Harbour, Fla.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT, as a powerful partner in the coalition for justice in our nation, has spearheaded the major reforms of the past decade that have brought hope and progress to millions of black Americans. You are the people who helped us pass the civil rights laws in the Sixties, took the fangs out of George Wallace, and helped send Haynsworth and Carswell back home to suck on mint juleps instead of passing on our precious rights as members of the Supreme Court. The record of that decade of achievement is significant.

But in the harsh cold light of the Seventies, the victories of the Sixties have lost some of their luster. The court decisions, congressional legislation, and executive orders, for the most part simply conferred upon black citizens rights long enjoyed by whites. In the first flush of victory, it was easy to become jubilant over a federal law banning discrimination in public places.

But we have found that it does not mean much to have the right to sleep in the Americana if you don't have the money to pay the rent. You can't take Title VII down to the grocery store. The owner wants cash. And while the great accomplishments of the Sixties provided the tools and the opportunities to bring about improved economic conditions for black people, they fell far short of the restructuring of our economy that would enable the masses of black people who are poor and who are working people, to have the cool green cash that spells economic liberation.

In the Sixties, we were fighting for our rights, which we tore from a reluctant nation. In the Sixties, the burning issue was whether blacks would be allowed to ride the buses and where they would sit. In the Seventies, the issues have shifted. Now the issues are whether black people will be allowed to drive that bus, whether the masses of black people will have the money to pay the fare, whether blacks have their rightful place as executives and directors of the bus company and the unions it deals with and whether the bus routes will link the black ghetto to where the jobs are.

The issue of the day is, then, the economic empowerment of black people. This is the task to which we of the Urban League have committed ourselves, and it is the task which the labor movement, of all the partners in the coalition for justice in America, should find the most congenial to its special talents and interests.

It goes without saying that the goal of black Americans is total, unconditional and complete equality. For too long have we been excluded from parity with white Americans. For too long have we been victims of racism and discrimination.

Through our goal of economic empowerment of black people, we seek to achieve parity with other citizens of this nation whose skin is white, whose opportunities have not been withheld, and whose progress has been steady.

And we seek to do this through active alliances and coalitions with those elements of our society whose actions and ideals are consistent with ours, whose interests are similar and who share our commitment to a society that is just, a society that is fair, and a society that is decent.

One of the prerequisites of such coalitions is honesty. The partners must deal with each other from positions of equality and mutual respect. At times, they will say things that hurt, but it is far better for such feelings to be out in the open, freely discussed and dealt with, than to be festering beneath the surface, only to explode later.

It is in this spirit of mutual respect and the honesty your coalition demands, that I must call to your attention the deep frustration and suspicions black people have of the labor movement. These feelings are entirely due to the racially restrictive practices of a handful of unions.

I refuse to magnify the wrongdoings of a few unions and thus join those who are the real enemies of black people, poor people, and working people. I recognize that the AFL-CIO and the labor movement in general is the home of some of the most progressive elements in American life, and is the beneficiary of the loyalty of black workers.

IT IS WRONG, I believe, to condemn the entire labor movement, which has brought so much to so many black workers, for the racism of a selfish few.

It is wrong, I believe, to attempt to weaken strong unions so that when blacks are finally admitted to them, they will no longer be worth joining.

It is wrong, I believe, to take refuge in some home-town plans and other artificial devices that do not work, have not worked, and will not work, to give people the illusion that something is being done.

And it is wrong for the labor movement to become overly defensive about the actions of a few of its members and to zealously defend them in the vague hopes that they'll shape up sometime in the future.

I know that your leadership is working hard on this problem. I know that the Urban League and other groups are cooperating with many unions in the joint efforts to increase the numbers of black craftsmen and apprentices. And I am pleased that the Urban League has made progress with some construction unions.

But in all candor I must say it is too little and too slow, in the face of the much that remains to be done. In the fraternal spirit of our mutual interests in economic justice, in the recognition that change must come from within, and in the conviction that deeds, not resolutions are called for, I ask this convention to intensify the pressures upon your backward brothers and raise them to the moral and pragmatic standards the rest of the labor movement follows.

Alternative Plan Pressed:

Nixon's Economic Policies Fail To Create Jobs as Promised

ECONOMIC POLICIES under Pres. Nixon's wage-price controls failed to create jobs as promised when the plan was unveiled four months ago, AFL-CIO manpower expert Julius Rothman declared in a network radio interview.

"You cannot create jobs artificially," Rothman said in calling for expansion of "real job-creation mechanisms," such as the Public Employment Program that is part of the 1971 Emergency Employment Act.

Rothman, who is associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs and president of the Human Resources Development Institute, appeared on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Rothman said that while the Emergency Employment Act is aimed in the right direction, its impact on an unemployment total that continues to top 5 million has been only "a drop in the bucket." But, he stressed, expansion and extension of the two-year program would mean more jobs for "workers earning enough money that they can spend" and help create additional jobs in the economy.

Rothman, who has headed HRDI since its creation as the AFL-CIO's manpower arm three years ago, said that the Apprenticeship Outreach program, "beamed at bringing minority youth into the building trades," has "done an excellent job" in equipping disadvantaged young men with the skills they need.

He pointed out that HRDI is now also heavily involved in helping returning veterans find jobs or obtain job training through counselling services at separation centers and at the institute's 50 offices around the country.

THE NIXON ADMINISTRATION keeps bragging that Phase 2 of its new economic program is working. Certainly wages, by and large, are coming under controls. On prices there may be more sound and fury than real consumer protection.

But when it comes to jobs—the ostensible reason for much of which the President is calling for—the situation is even more disquieting.

In fact, unemployment, instead of going down in response to Phase 1 of the new program, went up during November, reaching the 6 percent point.

The job situation is reminiscent of what happened when Nixon first went into office and promised the labor movement that his economic program of "cooling off" the economy would stop inflation without boosting unemployment.

For almost three years that promise stood while the figures told the true story—unemployment went from 3.1 million in January of 1969 when Nixon came into office to 5,160,000 seasonally adjusted last month; the jobless rate soared from 3.4 percent to 6 percent.

Are there any signs that the new economic policy is going to produce jobs any better than the old one did?

So far there are not. This is especially important in view of the fact that the basic "trickle down" economic policy of Nixon and his advisers remains the same today as it was three years ago—boost profits, business will invest and the improved conditions will make their way down the nation's economic structure finally to benefit those at the bottom.

Liberal and labor economists don't agree. They contend that businessmen do not invest their money because they want to create jobs but to make money.

These conflicting views raise the question of whether the new Nixon program of giving major tax advantages to business with relatively small, token relief to the lower brackets is going to boom the economy enough to provide the jobs that are needed for a growing work force and lower the 6 percent jobless rate.

Obviously, the November employment figures have a bearing on the answer. These show that unemployment went up on a seasonal basis by 210,000 over the month. But, the major crunch came in the fact that jobs have not kept pace with a growing workforce. For the first time in American history there were 80 million Americans employed, but there were still 5,160,000 without jobs.

In brief, the economy has failed to grow sufficiently to absorb the new workers, mostly young people.

The Administration concedes that a 6 percent jobless rate is too much. It is shooting for a 4 percent rate, although even that rate is too high by labor standards. When can we expect the 4 percent rate to be reached?

The National Planning Association—a non-profit, non-political organization which represents all segments of the economy, including labor—predicts that it will be 1974 before the 4 percent rate is likely to be attained as things stand now.

THE WARNING HERE, although the association takes no position, is that far more direct measures to increase employment will have to be taken now than the Administration has shown any inclination to take.

The President at first opposed direct job-producing programs which Congress eventually passed despite his opposition. Now there is deep dissatisfaction with the way in which the program finally is being carried out.

Instead of providing jobs for the jobless, the program is being administered in a way that helps the states and larger municipalities to save on taxes through phony firings and rehirings rather than creating new public service jobs.

Latest published reports show that while 125,000 public service jobs were supposed to be created only 60,000 persons have actually been hired to date.

THE JOB-CREATION Pres. Nixon promised when he unveiled his wage-price controls four months ago never materialized, Julius Rothman, center, president of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, noted on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Robert Levey, left, of the Washington Post and Donald Finley of United Press International.

Key Votes on Child Care, Retroactivity

Column I shows the 210-186 House vote on Dec. 7 to establish a new program of quality day-care services for children of working mothers. Pres. Nixon's veto then killed the bill, which also provided for continuation of anti-poverty programs. On labor's scorecard, 179 Democrats and 31 Republicans cast right votes (R) for the bill, while 134 Republicans and 52 Democrats voted wrong (W).*

Column II is the 209-151 vote on Dec. 10 that seriously weakened the retroactivity provision in the economic stabilization bill. It would have barred most workers in private industry from collecting pay raises withheld during the 90-day wage freeze. The damage was later repaired in a House-Senate conference. Right votes against the amendment were cast by 136 Democrats and 15 Republicans. Voting wrong were 142 Republicans and 67 Democrats.*

Congress Sputters Toward Close:

Senate Fight on Foreign Aid Stalls End-of-Session Drive

acceptable by all parties involved, provided for the transfer of 40 million acres of land and mineral rights and nearly $1 billion in cash and future oil royalties. It was approved by a 307-60 vote in the House and by voice vote in the Senate.

And some measures just a step away from final approval were put off until the start of the second session on Jan. 18.

Thus, House managers of a far-reaching campaign reform bill decided to put off a vote on final passage of the House-Senate conference agreement that the Senate has already approved.

Despite the delay, and despite some opposition, the measure has general bipartisan support and is expected to be cleared for the President's signature early in the second session—to take effect 60 days later.

It imposes a spending limit for candidates for public office of 10 cents for each eligible voter for authorized expenditures on television and radio broadcasting, advertising in newspapers, magazines and billboards, and paid mass telephone campaigns.

But no more than 60 percent of the candidate's authorized spending figure may be used for radio and television broadcasts. The candidate may, however, spend the entire amount on non-broadcasting expenditures. A unique feature added to the bill in conference provides an automatic increase in the spending authority when the cost of living index rises.

In a surprise move that led to some criticism from both liberal and conservative sources, Congress sent to the President a bill imposing work requirements in the Administration's welfare reform legislation—but omitting the income guarantees that are an important part of the bill. One description of the measure — by a conservative Republican—was that it represented the stick but not the carrot of the welfare reform package.

As the Senate pressed toward adjournment, the Administration won its fight for confirmation of the appointment of William H. Rehnquist to the Supreme Court.

Opponents, led by Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), had sought to put off action in the hope that public opinion against the nomination would switch the votes of enough senators to defeat Rehnquist.

An attempt by Rehnquist's supporters to shut off debate fell far short of the required two-thirds majority. But then a motion to defer action until the second session was soundly defeated, and opponents of the nomination agreed to an immediate vote.

Rehnquist was then confirmed, 68-26. with three Republicans joining 23 Democrats in opposing the nomination.

Pres. Nixon's veto of the anti-poverty bill that contained an important new program of quality day care for children of working mothers put Senate Republicans on the spot.

The final version of the legislation had been approved by the Senate, 63-17, with strong bipartisan support.

Pres. Nixon's veto message in effect told the majority of Senate Republicans that they had supported a radical program that would undermine the American family and "communalize" its children.

A sufficient number of GOP senators dutifully changed their position and the 51-36 vote for overriding the veto fell short of the required two-thirds majority. Ten Republicans joined most Democrats in voting to override.

A bipartisan group of child care supporters promptly announced plans to seek passage of a modified version of the legislation.

The House and Senate remained deadlocked on the basic foreign aid authorization bill that normally is a prerequisite for the annual battle over how much to actually appropriate for the various programs.

An apparent agreement to postpone action on the authorization bill until the second session and, meanwhile, vote funds to continue the program temporarily seemed to be falling apart in the Senate and forced postponement of adjournment.

The problem of getting a majority of senators to agree on any one position was compounded by the increasing difficulty in keeping on hand the 50 senators necessary for a quorum to do business. Senate leaders sent wires urging absentees to return to Washington and sought to persuade others to cancel departure plans.

The issue was still unresolved when the AFL-CIO News went to press.

N.Y. Catholic Teachers Vote to Continue Strike

New York—Lay teachers in the 329 parochial schools of the Archdiocese of New York voted by a 6-to-1 margin to remain on strike until their demands for "social justice" are met by the Association of Catholic Schools.

The Federation of Catholic Teachers, Local 2092 of the American Federation of Teachers, struck the parochial school system Nov. 22 after the archdiocesan agency refused to budge from its wage proposal offering annual salary increases ranging from $200 to $600.

FCT Pres. Barry F. Ryan reported that some progress has since been made on fringe benefits, but there has been no movement on pay. He described the archdiocesan proposal as "actually an offer to cut wages in this period of 6 percent inflation per year."

The union represents 2,800 lay teachers in the schools of the 10-county archdiocese, which includes the New York City boroughs of Manhattan, the Bronx and Staten Island. Teachers in the parochial elementary schools currently are paid $6,600 to $9,600 a year if they have degrees. Those without degrees earn $5,000 to $5,800. High school teachers, all of whom must have degrees, make $7,000 to $13,200.

The union is seeking a single salary scale for all teachers to range from $6,400 to $8,000 for non-degree holders and from $8,500 to $15,400 for those with degrees.

Half of the teachers in the parochial schools are members of religious communities, a small number of whom have remained out in support of the lay teachers.

Strong support for the strike also has been expressed by the newly reorganized United Teachers of New York State, the parent body of the Catholic teachers' local. UTNYS Pres. Albert Shanker, speaking at an FCT rally, called the strike a "breakthrough" for private and parochial school teachers throughout the country that "will make the difference between collective bargaining and collective begging."

The dispute has totally closed five of the schools and has sharply curtailed classroom activity in more than a hundred others, the union said.

It called on the state commissioner of education to enforce state standards in the schools, charging that "11-year-olds are being used as baby-sitters for 6-year-olds" and that "parents with little or no formal education are acting as monitors instead of teachers."

Asbestos Dust Standard Still Above Safe Level

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has issued stricter standards that limit the exposure of workers to asbestos dust—but not to the safe level sought by the AFL-CIO and its Industrial Union Dept.

The change came one month after the federation called on the Labor Dept. to take emergency action to head off a massive epidemic of cancer and lung diseases among workers exposed to asbestos dust.

OSHA, using its emergency powers for the first time under the Occupational Safety & Health Act, ordered the permissible level of asbestos dust reduced from 12 fibers per milliliter to 5 for an eight-hour period.

Organized labor had asked Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson to have the level lowered 2 fibers per cubic centimeter—well below the 5 per milliliter standard.

Sheldon W. Samuels, secretary of the IUD's Ad Hoc Committee of the Asbestos Hazard, said that labor safety specialists are disappointed in OSHA's action.

"The new standard is still inadequate and not at all in accord with the best medical evidence available," he stressed.

The appeal by the federation and the IUD committee for the lower threshold level was based on a study prepared by the Mount Sinai Medical School showing that the use of asbestos in industry brought "appallingly high" rates of cancer among 5 million workers involved.

The workers affected range from asbestos miners, industrial and construction workers, to service employes who use buffing machines on asbestos floor tile, Samuels noted.

Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther, who heads OSHA, admitted however, that the new emergency standard was issued "in the light of increasing information on the results of exposure of employes to airborne asbestos dust."

The standard went into effect Dec. 7 after publication in the Federal Register.

Guenther said that engineering methods such as enclosure of operations involving asbestos, vacuum sweeping and local ventilation could be used to meet the new exposure limits.

Where such methods are not feasible or fail to reduce concentrations, Guenther said employers must provide approved respiratory devices for workers.

Samuels, noting that lung cancer among workers exposed to asbestos dust is many times greater than with the general public, pointed out that the OSHA controls are not nearly as strict as those proposed by the Environmental Protection Agency.

He said that EPA regulations would result in lower levels of asbestos dust in the community than on the job. The EPA proposals would prohibit the spraying of materials containing asbestos in the atmosphere, and control equipment would have to be 99.9 percent effective.

The IUD committee on asbestos hazards is scheduled to meet next month to review the OSHA standard to determine what action can be taken to have the exposure limit reduced to a safe level.

George H. R. Taylor, secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, said that organized labor would continue to press for the lower level recommended by medical experts.

Apperson Heads D. C. Central Body

George W. Apperson was elected president of the Greater Washington, D.C. Central Labor Council, succeeding J. C. Turner, who had held the post since 1958. Apperson, president of Transit Union Division 689, had served as secretary of the council.

Turner resigned recently to become legislative representative and assistant to the president of the Operating Engineers.

Jobless Aid Extended For Hardest-Hit Areas

It will, however, provide up to three months of payments to some 538,000 jobless workers in 11 states and Puerto Rico who have already exhausted their benefits—and to others who use up their eligibility during the next six months.

A complex formula determines whether a state is eligible for the new program. The "trigger" is a 6.5 percent jobless rate, based on both insured unemployment and the number of persons who have exhausted their benefits. In the original Senate version, the trigger was only 6 percent.

Magnuson's office said the 6.5 percent formula in the legislation currently covers the following jurisdictions:

Alaska, California, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nevada, New Jersey, Puerto Rico, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

Several other states are close to the required unemployment level, and some states on the list could be excluded if the job picture improves.

The Senate took a legislative shortcut to move the bill to the White House before Congress adjourned. It added its provisions as an amendment to a non-controversial House-passed bill dealing with the unemployment insurance fund. A House-Senate conference committee then reached agreement on the trimmed-back final version.

H.A.Schneider, Grain Millers Leader, Dies

Minneapolis—Harold A. Schneider, secretary-treasurer and a founder of the Grain Millers, died of a heart attack. He was 62.

In messages of sympathy to his family and the union, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland recalled "his devotion to the cause of labor and his warm friendship."

Schneider was born in Conway Springs, Kan., and became active in the National Council of Grain Processors — the forerunner of AFGM. He was elected secretary-treasurer of the Grain Processors in 1946 and was elected to that post with the Grain Millers after the union was chartered by the AFL in 1948.

He also served on the executive board of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and was a member of the War Labor Board during World War II.

He is survived by his wife Bonnie, a son, step-son and four grandchildren.

Clears Federal Pay Increase:

Congress Votes Approval Of Retroactive Wage Hikes

Here's how it came about:

- The Senate had approved retroactive payment of pay raises withheld during the freeze period unless the amount was "unreasonably inconsistent" with the Pay Board standards that were applied to wage increases after Nov. 15.
- The House Banking & Currency Committee had adopted an even more permissive standard—directing retroactive payment of increases that were not "unreasonably inconsistent with the rate at which wages and salaries have increased in the economy generally."
- But on a 209-151 vote, the House rejected this language. (Roll-call vote on Page 6) Instead, it voted to require retroactive payments only "if prices have been increased, taxes have been raised or appropriations have been made to cover these increases."

The Pay Board has already authorized retroactivity in those cases where it could be determined that prices had been raised before the freeze to cover the cost of anticipated pay increases. So the House language in effect authorized raises only for groups of local, county and state employes who are paid from appropriated funds. Teachers were the primary group involved.

- A House-Senate conference committee, however, then took the sting out of the House action by including both the Senate and House language in the final bill.

The basic provision of retroactivity for all workers—private and public—is contained by the Senate language. The House language provides, however, that there won't be any quibble over the amount of the raise for teachers and other public workers in terms of Pay Board standards. As long as the budget provided for the increases, payment of the full amount is likely to be approved.

Both the Senate and House then approved the final version by voice vote, clearing the legislation for the President's signature.

The retroactivity applies to contracts that were negotiated prior to the Aug. 15 freeze and that provided for deferred increases to take effect during the freeze period.

There are no exact statistics as to the number of workers who will be eligible for back pay. In addition to hundreds of thousands of teachers, the category includes more than 600,000 postal workers who had a contractual raise due in October and 80,000 packinghouse workers who were due a 25-cent hourly raise in September.

There remains a gray area, left to Pay Board interpretation. Not specifically covered by the mandatory retroactivity would be contracts negotiated during or after the 90-day freeze period that provide for increases starting before Nov. 15. It is up to the Pay Board to set policy for such agreements.

The federal employe pay raise was passed by the Senate and included in the final bill by the House-Senate conference committee.

It holds federal workers more strictly than other groups to the 5.5 percent general Pay Board standard, which means that they will receive less of a raise than called for by comparability standards with private industry.

A Bureau of Labor Statistics salary survey found that federal employes would need an average 6.6 percent increase just to keep them in line with private industry salary scales as of last June.

Under a permanent law, they were to have gotten that raise in January—unless the President proposed an "alternative" plan and neither the House nor the Senate rejected it.

Pres. Nixon's "alternative" plan, announced early this fall, was to defer the January raise six months. And neither the House nor the Senate at that time disapproved it.

The effect of the current congressional action—assuming the President signs the Economic Stabilization Act as congressional sources expect—would be to restore the January date, but trim back the amount.

"Legislative history" established in the Senate debate made it clear that the intent of Congress is that the President promptly restore wage board pay adjustments for the government's blue-collar workers whose pay is based on prevailing wages in their areas. Nixon had ordered a six-month deferral of blue-collar pay increases to match his postponement of the salary increases.

Restoration of the January pay date for salaried federal employes will also mean a January raise for military servicemen who are given increases to match the civilian employe raise.

The Administration was clearly unhappy with the federal pay raise provision in the bill. And it had taken the position that retroactivity for frozen wage increases should be decided solely by the Pay Board—which by a 10-5 vote rejected a motion by the five labor members similar to the language now adopted by Congress. But the President has no way to veto those provisions of the bill without also vetoing legislation continuing his economic powers beyond their Apr. 30, 1971, expiration date.

Ironically, until last year the Nixon Administration opposed the standby control powers that Congress voted. And last year, while accepting the legislation, the Administration said firmly that it would never use them on the entire economy without first seeking the specific approval of Congress.

That pledge was ignored, however, when the President imposed the Aug. 15 wage-price freeze.

Wisconsin Labor Editor Richard Huffman Dies

Madison, Wis.—Richard H. Huffman, founder and editor of the Union Labor News here in the 1930s, died Dec. 9 of a heart attack. He was 67.

Under his leadership, the monthly publication reached a circulation of 25,000 throughout central Wisconsin. It became the official publication not only of the Madison Federation of Labor, but of the Sauk, Marathon, Fond du Lac and Stevens Point Portage County Councils and the Wisconsin Rapids Central Council.

AFL-CIO Drafts Guide For State Safety Laws

The framework of a model job safety law for states has been issued by the AFL-CIO for use in organized labor's coming drive in legislatures across the country for enactment of effective occupational safety and health measures.

The working model, distributed to all affiliated unions and state labor bodies, incorporates the key features of the existing federal Occupational Safety & Health Act, which could be diluted by ineffective state standards and enforcement.

The provisions for a model state law to guard against this was drafted by the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health after the Labor Dept. denied the federation an administrative hearing on the department's policies and procedures governing state job safety programs.

Organized labor has repeatedly protested that the Labor Dept.'s guidelines for state safety plans fall far short of the intent of Congress.

Labor's objective in the legislative drive will be to incorporate all the key federal standards and provisions into the state safety programs, Sec. George H. R. Taylor of the AFL-CIO standing committee said.

Taylor pointed out that the failure of the states to come up with effective safety laws was the chief reason that Congress enacted a stiff federal program.

Reinforcing Taylor's contention was the report of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration for its first six months of operations which showed that 80 percent of the workplaces inspected were not in compliance with federal safety standards.

This means, Taylor noted, that 8 of 10 plants had been permitted by the states to operate with unsafe or unhealthful conditions.

OSHA said in its six-month report that of the 9,300 inspections conducted in establishments employing more than 1.5 million workers, only 1,842 were found to conform to the federal act.

OSHA issued 5,636 citations for violations that led to proposed penalties totaling $361,692 during the period.

While federal government employes are not directly covered, the safety act does provide for a program that is consistent with the federal safety standards for private industry.

A new 15-member Federal Safety Advisory Committee was set up to replace the old Federal Safety Council established in 1962.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson appointed five representatives of labor to the council. They are Pres. John F. Griner of the Government Employes, Pres. Francis S. Filbey of the Postal Workers, Pres. James H. Rademacher of the Letter Carriers, International Rep. William Ryan of the Machinists, and International Rep. Robert Crum of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Labor Backs Independent Agency, Strong Standards on Product Safety

The stronger of two consumer product safety bills was endorsed by the AFL-CIO in testimony before a House Commerce subcommittee.

Labor's support went to a bill introduced by Subcommittee Chairman John E. Moss (D-Calif.) and based on recommendations of the National Commission on Product Safety.

It would create an independent agency to set and enforce product safety standards—keyed to the interests of consumers, not of industry.

By contrast, the AFL-CIO said, a bill proposed by the Administration "omits or whittles down" many of the product safety commission's key recommendations. The federation's testimony was presented by Evelyn Dubrow, chairman of the AFL-CIO consumer legislation subcommittee.

Some 20 million Americans are injured each year in accidents related to consumer products, the AFL-CIO noted, resulting in 30,000 deaths and 110,000 permanent disabilities.

To reduce this toll, the federation urged legislation "to establish a rational, effective means of seeing that safety is built into the products that families buy, keep, use and misuse around the house."

It cited these key differences between the labor-supported bill and the Administration version:

- The Administration bill would put the product safety program in the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare rather than in an independent commission. There, it could be "lost amid a host of competing programs in a heavily-layered large bureaucracy."
- There is no provision in the Administration bill for a consumer safety advocate. Such an office is needed to provide the technical expertise to challenge industry claims when the facts warrant it. If Congress establishes an overall Consumer Protection Agency—as contemplated in a House-passed bill—the consumer safety advocate should be attached to that agency to give him greater independence, the AFL-CIO said.
- On both product coverage and standards development, there are loopholes in the Administration bill, the federation testified. Particularly valuable in the labor-supported measure is the authority to set standards for new consumer products, including advance testing before they are released for general sale. "There should not be an unlimited commercial right to use the general public as the primary safety testing ground for new or little-known substances."
- Unlike the Administration bill, the Moss bill authorizes the product safety agency to esetablish its own testing facilities. It also sets up procedures requiring manufacturers to certify to distributors that their products have been tested for conformance with applicable safety standards.

The AFL-CIO did, however, endorse one feature in the Administration bill not included in the Moss bill—the right of private citizens to bring suit for enforcement of the legislation.

Nixon Names John Penello To NLRB Seat

John A. Penello, regional director for the National Labor Relations Board at Baltimore and a 34-year NLRB career man, has been nominated by Pres. Nixon for a five-year term as a Labor Board member.

Penello, a Democrat, is the third Nixon nominee to the board. Previously, the President named two Republicans, Chairman Edward B. Miller and Member Ralph E. Kennedy. Other board members are John H. Fanning, a Democrat and Howard Jenkins, Jr., a Republican.

Penello's confirmation would mean a board composed of three Republicans and two Democrats. He would succeed Gerald A. Brown.

Beginning as a field examiner for the NLRB in 1937 at Baltimore, Penello worked his way up through the ranks of the agency.

Meany Acclaims 'Victory' On Validity of Contracts

Veto Tactics Dilute Gains In Congress

By David L. Perlman

Congress took some important steps to restart the nation's long-stalled economy, but a tug of war between the Executive and Legislative branches of government sharply limited the first session's achievements.

Vetoes and veto threats nullified, stalled or weakened congressional action and strengthened the hand of the conservative coalition that remained a powerful force despite Democratic victories in the 1970 congressional elections.

Thus, national health security, minimum wage improvements and foreign trade reform to halt the export of American jobs and capital remained bottled up during the first session—not reaching the floor of either the House or Senate.

On other key domestic issues:

- Congress won an important round when the Administration reluctantly accepted a public service employment program that was high on the AFL-CIO's legislative priority list. Pres Nixon had vetoed a similar bill the year before.
- A companion, job-creating program of accelerated public works construction was killed by a presidential veto, however. It would be "inflationary," Nixon insisted, to put 150,000 jobless Americans to work building waste treatment plants, health centers and other needed public facilities.
- Congress made a few improvements in Nixon's tax proposals. But the final version of the legislation gave business and industry the enormous tax handouts the President had proposed as the heart of his "trickle-down" theory of helping the economy through bigger profits for the biggest corporations. And a presidential veto threat forced Congress to back down from a voluntary tax allocation that would have allowed presidential candidates to finance their campaigns without depending on big contributors.

Nixon was agreeable to the final version that put off the plan until the 1976 presidential campaign—leaving him his big financial advantage in the 1972 election.

- But Congress refused to swallow intact the President's demand

Fund Probe Sought On R-T-W Suits

Detroit—Employes who are financing court attacks on union shop and agency shop contracts may be violating the Landrum-Griffin Act, two prominent union attorneys charged.

Lawyers for the Michigan State AFL-CIO and of the Auto Workers joined in calling on U.S. Attorney Gen. John N. Mitchell and Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson to investigate the financing of litigation brought against unions by the National Right to Work Committee and its Legal Defense Foundation.

Supposedly the suits are brought by individuals working under union security contracts. But UAW Counsel Stephen I. Schlossberg and Michigan AFL-CIO Counsel Theodore Sachs stressed that the cases are admittedly financed by the Right to Work Committee and its legal arm.

They produced copies of solicitation letters seeking hundreds of thousands of dollars to carry as far as the Supreme Court challenges to the right of labor organizations with union shop agreements to carry on legal political education and action programs.

Employers and others solicited for funds are told that "all contributions to the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation

Nixon Signs Bill Granting Retroactivity

The labor movement won an "absolute victory" with the enactment and signing of the one-year extension of the Economic Stabilization Act, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The new law "preserves labor-management contracts entered into prior to the Aug. 15 freeze order," Meany said, and "guarantees that teachers, other public employes and union members generally will receive retroactive wage increases that rightfully belonged to them and had been denied them by presidential order."

The AFL-CIO president hailed concurrence by Congress "in our belief in the validity of contracts," and said that "it is regrettable that the Pay Board and the Administration created unnecessary economic chaos by ignoring the common sense approach we urged in the Pay Board meeting on Nov. 8."

The President said on signing the law that he was issuing an executive order providing for a 5.5 percent pay increase for federal workers in January, as directed by Congress, and an order granting similar increases to all military personnel.

The President, however, said that there would be no automatic

Administration Claim Refuted:

No Job Spurt Seen From Devaluation

By Rex Hardesty

There is absolutely no evidence to support the Nixon Administration's contentions that the devaluation of the dollar will create 500,000 new jobs in the United States, the AFL-CIO said.

Commenting on Administration claims in the wake of the devaluation of the dollar, Federation Research Director Nat Goldfinger said, "the action on exchange rates and the dollar does not get at the basic, long-range problems of trade."

And it doesn't get to the "problems of the multinational firms and their export of jobs, technology and capital," Goldfinger said, even though "there may be a temporary, short-run impact on the balance of payments as speculators' dollars return to the U.S. money markets from Europe and Japan."

Some $45 billion in American currency is now being held by foreign central banks and some speculators are expected to now being willing to take their profits, leading to the short-run benefit Goldfinger foresees.

In conjunction with the devaluation, the United States announced

Poll Questions Geared To Anti-Union Clients

If you believed a few years back that 93 percent of the American people disapprove of the union shop, you will probably be convinced by similar "evidence" that most union members disapprove of the reception given Pres. Nixon at the AFL-CIO convention.

The source of the two statements is the same—a polling firm in Princeton, N.J., called the Opinion Research Corp.

It happens to be the favorite pollster for an assortment of right-wing groups, big corporations, employer organizations and the Republican National Committee. And for clients who want to do a bit of bragging about public support for their views, it can draw up questions virtually guaranteed to produce the desired response.

Take one of the questions in a nationwide poll ordered by the Na-

Court Asked to Uphold Union Political Rights

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to reaffirm the right of union political committees to help labor-endorsed candidates with funds voluntarily contributed by union members.

The federation's brief to the Supreme Court challenges the conviction of a St. Louis Pipefitters local and two local officers for violating the law prohibiting political contributions by unions and corporations to candidates for federal office.

The AFL-CIO charged that lower courts erred in not requiring the government to prove that the political contributions that admittedly were made were financed by involuntary rather than voluntary contributions.

By not making this distinction, the AFL-CIO said, the district court and the Justice Dept. misled the jury into an assumption that the union was guilty if its political committee contributed campaign funds—regardless of the source of these funds.

The federation's brief cited both

LABOR HUMAN RIGHTS AWARD of the Jewish Labor Committee is presented to Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers, at a dinner in New York. From the left are Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers Vice Pres. Charles S. Zimmerman, Hall and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland.

JLC Honors Paul Hall For Human Rights Aid

New York—Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers was described as "a man whose union is always ready to help others," as he was honored by the Jewish Labor Committee with its Labor Human Rights Award.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, in presenting the award, praised the Seafarers' cooperative support of other unions and its work in civil rights activities. The SIU is always ready to help, "with money, marbles or chalk," Kirkland noted.

He said the Seafarers' civil rights work is typified by the Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship, run by the union at Piney Point, Md.

"Boys are being trained there for useful jobs in society," Kirkland said, "and they are being trained without regard to race, creed or color."

Hall, an AFL-CIO vice president, is the fifth recipient of the award. Previous honorees are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel, New York City AFL-CIO Pres. Harry Van Arsdale and Ladies' Garment Workers Pres. Louis Stulberg.

Meany sent a message praising Hall as a man "of broad concern for human rights, especially in the area of civil liberties, and an outspoken advocate of the individual's right to privacy." Meany, the honorary chairman of the awards dinner, was unable to attend while recuperating from illness and was represented by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Keenan paid tribute to both Hall and the Jewish Labor Committee for their work in civil rights.

"The Jewish Labor Committee is dedicated to the idea that everyone is entitled to a fair shake in life," Keenan said. "That's why they are in the forefront of the fight right here and that's why they are fighting to have Jews in Soviet Russia made free to practice their religion and participate in their own culture."

Hall accepted the tribute "not for myself, but for the SIU and because I am proud to be associated with the good work being done by the JLC."

He praised the efforts of David Dubinsky, president emeritus of the ILGWU, and Charles S. Zimmerman, a vice president of the union, in organizing the JLC.

Zimmerman, who stepped down as president of the JLC and serves now as chairman of its National Trade Union Council for Human Rights, was the toastmaster. Other speakers included John Morsell, associate director of the NAACP, Family Judge Jacob T. Zuckerman, JLC president, and Emanuel Muravchik, JLC executive director.

ACWA's Samuel Named Carnegie Corp. Trustee

New York—Vice Pres. Howard D. Samuel of the Clothing Workers was elected to the board of trustees of the Carnegie Corp. of New York, a philanthropic foundation.

The foundation deals primarily in grants to universities, colleges and educational organizations. It also assists planning and pilot projects for extending health services.

Labor to Press Complaints:

Price Confusion Mounts As Enforcement Flounders

By Mike Bosch

The government has acknowledged that there are no effective controls over retail prices, thus adding to the widespread confusion over complex Phase 2 guidelines and regulations.

Edward F. Preston, assistant commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service for stabilization, said in an interview with the Washington Post that only aggregate, or total, prices are subject to Phase 2 economic controls, and not individual prices.

Aggregate prices, profits and markups are compiled quarterly, which means that possible violations cannot be detected until those reports are available.

Another IRS spokesman observed that "it will take an audit of a corporation's books" to determine if any violations have taken place.

AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis, who is heading labor's nationwide price watchdog campaign, said that it would almost require a certified public accountant to tell if a pricing violation has taken place.

"But we're not CPAs," Perlis said, "so we are going to take every complaint of price gouging we receive and get the enforcement agency, namely the IRS, to check it out."

"Whatever credibility this Administration had with consumers has been destroyed," he added, "and the Administration is now destroying the credibility of the IRS also."

Preston said it is impossible to tell from individual price increases whether a retailer is violating the law, and he admitted that the prefreeze price lists still required by Phase 2 have no legal significance.

"Maybe their existence misleads the consumer," he suggested.

A spokesman for retail supermarkets, Clarence G. Adamy, president of the 230 member National Association of Food Chains, said, "there is no way you can break the law on an individual price."

While individual retail prices are not controlled, average markups and profits are required to stay at pre-freeze levels during Phase 2, unless the Pay Commission finds increases justified under its various criteria. The commission has set a 2.5 percent guideline for average price increases.

But the revised Phase 2 regulations allow the retailer's markup to be figured in a variety of ways.

One method is item-by-item, which is allowed for easily identified units such as automobiles but not for the thousands of items in a supermarket. Another is by departments, such as meat, dairy and grocery department. Still another method is by all the stores in a division. Yet another is by the company as a whole.

Before acknowledging that it would have to audit a company's books to determine if a violation had occurred, the IRS had refused to disclose the disposition of complaints because of the "confidentiality" of the information received from companies under investigation.

Perlis, in a telegram to the IRS, called on the service to announce individual case dispositions if Phase 2 is "to proceed effectively and with credibility."

The revelation by the IRS came as confusion and protests continued to mount over the entire price control program.

One reporter called several IRS offices and asked the same simple question about a price increase. He drew response of "yes" from an IRS office in New York State, "no" from one in New Jersey and "we don't know" from the one in Chicago.

When Pres. Nixon created the commission he stressed that all of its members would be "public . . . not beholden to any special interest group."

Soon afterwards, four of the seven members were identified by the AFL-CIO as being business oriented or having direct corporate ties. Newsday later identified two others has having similar backgrounds.

When the White House was asked to define "public" as it relates to the Price Commission's membership, it refused to respond for the record.

The Price Commission is also grappling with the issue of whether or not there is to be any public disclosure of the data submitted to it by companies, and if so, how much.

Consumer advocates and organized labor insist that a certain amount of this information must be disclosed to insure the credibility of the price control machinery.

But a major spokesman for big business, Arch Booth, executive vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, argued that any public disclosure would be "grossly unfair."

In an interview with the Wall Street Journal, Booth warned that business "cooperation may be withdrawn if they (the Price Commission) are going to let the public see confidential records."

Jennings Hails Decision In Bias Case Settlement

The settlement of a Justice Dept. suit alleging discrimination in hiring against blacks and Puerto Ricans by AMBAC, Springfield, Mass., has been hailed by Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The settlement arrived with the signing of a consent decree by the Justice Dept., the company and IUE Local 206, which represents AMBAC's Springfield workers. The decree provides for payment of $1,000 to each of 29 blacks and Puerto Ricans.

Part of this group will be accorded jobs when vacancies occur as if they had up to five years prehire seniority. Others will be placed on a preferential hiring list without pre-hire seniority. No present employe will be displaced as a result of the settlement.

Jennings said that "IUE is proud of its role in the settlement of the case. The provisions of the consent decree are wholly consistent with our principle. I am particularly happy that the internatioanl union, through its legal department, was instrumental in winning back pay for these 29 people.

"In addition, the members of Local 206 are to be commended for their overwhelming vote Dec. 5 approving the settlement with its provision for added seniority for victims of AMBAC's alleged discriminatory hiring policy. This provision involves considerable sacrifice by local members, some 900 of whom are on layoff."

The case was based on alleged discrimination during the 1966-69 period. Not initially involved in the 1968 suit, IUE was made a party in March 1971 although no charge was ever made against the union. It was brought in solely to enable it to bargain out the prehire seniority arrangement included in the settlement. Under past and present contracts between Local 206 and AMBAC, the company alone does all the hiring.

The two groups of beneficiaries named in the consent decree are made up of persons who applied for jobs at AMBAC, but were not hired. The decree also enjoins AMBAC from future discrimination on account of race, color or national origin.

AFL-CIO to Hold Price Conference

The AFL-CIO has called a conference of price watchdog liaison representatives of all affiliated unions for next Jan. 11, in Washington.

Representatives of more than 40 cooperating groups of senior citizens, minorities, women and consumers have also been invited to participate, Community Services Director Leo Perlis announced.

Federation Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Research Director Nat Goldfinger will address the conference. Also invited to speak and answer questions are Price Commission Chairman C. Jackson Grayson and Assistant Commissioner Edward F. Preston of the Internal Revenue Service.

Film Depicts Union Role In Job Corps Training

The story of five AFL-CIO building trades unions conducting Job Corps training programs to place 1,645 disadvantaged youths in jobs is told in a new film titled "Lost and Found."

Another 1,800 Job Corpsmen will be ready to go to work next spring as they complete their craft training courses at 34 Job Corps centers across the country.

The five unions—Bricklayers, Plasterers & Cement Masons, Painters, Carpenters and Operating Engineers—have operated the program under Labor Dept. grants for the past five years. They have placed 94 percent of the Job Corps trainees in union crafts.

The 27-minute color film focuses on several Job Corpsmen. It traces their progress from before they knew of the program, through their union training, and onto well-paying union jobs.

Besides depicting classroom sessions and on-the-job training by union instructors, the film also provides an insight on other Job Corps features, such as individual counseling, group living and athletics.

Each of the 34 Job Corps centers offers at least one union program and several provide as many as four separate craft training courses.

Placement of the trainees has been difficult in the past year because of the slump in construction activity. But the unions point out that better than 9 of 10 of the Job Corps graduates have found a future working in union crafts.

The average hourly earnings of union-placed trainees are more than 50 percent higher than those of other Job Corps graduates.

The first showing of the film was attended by a number of the top officers of the five unions, including Pres. M. A. Hutcheson of the Carpenters, Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers, Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters, Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers, and Pres. Joseph T. Power of the Plasterers & Cement Masons.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, who also attended the film premier, praised the unions for their increased involvement in the program. Hodgson said the unions have "steadily expanded their efforts for Job Corps enrollees since the Operating Engineers established the first program in 1967 with 80 trainees."

The film was produced under a Labor Dept. grant for the Job Corps recruiting program.

Administration Claim Refuted:

No Job Spurt Seen From Devaluation

the revocation of the 10 percent import surcharge which had been imposed as part of the Aug. 15 package.

Goldfinger's rebuttal came in the wake of Administration attempts to put devaluation in the "job development" category. As the Group of Ten meetings were beginning in Washington, D.C., presidential aide Peter G. Peterson held a briefing session for the press at which he predicted 500,000 to 750,000 new jobs.

Peterson's remarks were on the record and attributable to him, but were not for public use until Monday, Dec. 20. Then, when devaluation had been announced by Pres. Nixon himself Saturday and the International Monetary Fund had sanctioned the Group of Ten agreement Sunday, the "job development" speculation was also ready for publication.

Meanwhile, Donald Rumsfield, director of the Cost of Living Council, in a television interview program predicted that devaluation would bring an increase in jobs of "500,000 to 667,000."

Peterson said his predictions were based on Labor Dept. estimates that every $1 billion increase in the U.S. balance of trade would create 60,000 to 80,000 more U.S. jobs. Estimates of a $9 billion increase in trade from the new devalued dollar led to the prediction of 500,000 to 750,000 new jobs over a possible two-year period.

The various economic moves by the Nixon Administration in 1971 have had no impact on reducing unemployment. As the Dec. 19 Wall Street Journal pointed out, "What has not happened has been disappointing. There has been no decrease in the high unemployment rate or any real increase in job-providing capital spending by business."

Administration sensitivity on that point is reflected in the careful orchestration of the "job development" announcements by Peterson and Rumsfeld, which is similar to the Administration's attempt to call the 7 percent tax investment credit a "job development tax."

What the Group of Ten agreement did was fix specific limits on the dollar, which had been "floating" downward since Aug. 15 when Pres. Nixon announced his new economic program. The dollar would be devalued by 8.57 percent as a result of an increase in the price of gold from $35 to $38 an ounce, which Congress must approve. Shifts in other currencies would bring the dollar down about 12 percent.

The dollar had previously been cut loose from dependency on the price of gold and the formal acknowledgment of that move gave the world its first new monetary standard since the 1944 meeting in Bretton Woods, N.H., fixed the $35 an ounce price for gold.

AFL-CIO Brief Upholds Union Political Right

congressional intent during the debate on the political restrictions in the Taft-Hartley Act and previous court decisions as making it clear that the only concern of Congress was with the source of the funds, and not the administration of union political committees.

Committees such as COPE are clearly not required to be "separate and distinct entities, free of union control," the AFL-CIO brief contended.

The federation said it was filing its "friend of the court" brief in support of the local union because "organized labor considers the right to associate to promote political interests to be a fundamental constitutional freedom."

It added that labor's ability to represent its members successfully at the bargaining table depends on its ability to "preserve, strengthen and supplement" such laws as the National Labor Relations Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act and the Davis-Bacon Act.

The case is expected to be argued before the Supreme Court when it reconvenes in January.

Illegal Employer Funds Linked to R-T-W Suits

are deductible for personal and corporate income tax purposes."

At a news conference here, Sachs and UAW Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey said the "right to work" legal foundation solicits funds from corporations and employers to finance suits "to harass unions."

The letter to Mitchell and Hodgson raised the question of whether these activities and contributions by employers violate a section of the Landrum-Griffin Act prohibiting any "interested employer or employer association" from "directly or indirectly" financing or encouraging—except as a direct party to the case—action brought by a union member against his union.

Since the "work" committee has backed down from an apparent promise made by a spokesman to open up its books on fund-raising, the two attorneys urged Mitchell and Hodgson to undertake an immediate investigation.

The pertinent section of the law, they noted, expressed the "great concern" of Congress in protecting the rights of workers from employer interference "and we would assume you would wish to zealously enforce it."

One of the solicitation letters cited by the union attorneys sought $115,000 to finance a suit by a group of Detroit teachers and another asked $110,000 "for legal fees and staff costs" to sue the Machinists in California.

The goal, potential donors were told, is to prevent labor from electing "handpicked candidates to the state legislatures, to Congress, to the governor's office, and to the presidency."

Targets of other suits financed by the "right to work" group have been the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers, the State, County & Municipal Employes, the Auto Workers, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Radio & Television Artists.

In further apparent defiance of federal law, the union attorneys noted, employers serve on the advisory council of the "right to work" organizations that are financing and instigating the suits against the unions.

REGIONAL CONFERENCES conducted by the Service Employes in New York, Chicago and San Francisco explored Phase 2 developments and problems facing SEIU members across the country. Here, SEIU Pres. George Hardy briefs local union representatives at a Chicago session.

Meany Hails Victory for Labor On Validity of Union Contracts

increase in October 1972 due under the comparability law because it would be inconsistent with Pay Board guidelines.

Meany, noting this part of Nixon's statement, said "the President lost his fight to deny federal workers an overdue wage increase in order to pay part of the tax bonanza he gave big business. But even now he threatens a new attack on the wage increases that will be due these workers in October 1972. We will urge Congress to give federal workers their due, for they should not suffer in order to make big business richer."

The President's signature on the Economic Stabilization Act came a few days after a Pay Board action that was assailed by labor members as "grossly inequitable" to large groups of workers. The action involved a tight lid clamped on exceptions to the 5.5 percent wage increase guidelines.

The inevitable result, the five labor members warned, will be to create confusion at the bargaining table and "bury" the wage stabilization program under "an avalanche of appeals."

Under the Pay Board's rigid new policy statement, catch-up raises would be limited to no more than 1.5 percent and no increase totaling more than 7 percent a year could be approved—even when inequities and tandem relationships among groups of workers clearly call for a higher figure.

On the heels of the new directive came a confident prediction by the director of the Administration's Cost of Living Council, Donald Rumsfeld, that the presidentially-appointed Pay Board will "get considerably tougher" in reviewing negotiated increases.

The new law signed by the President mandates retroactive payment of virtually all pay increases withheld during the 90-day freeze, provided they had been negotiated before the Aug. 15 freeze date.

That section was considered a direct rebuke to the Pay Board, whose employer and "public" majority earlier had outvoted the motion of the five labor members to approve retroactive payment of the withheld increases which otherwise would go into the pockets of employers.

And the legislation also directed that the control authority over wages and salaries would not apply to increased employer payments to pension, insurance and health care programs—unless the President determines that the amount involved is unreasonable. It bars restrictions on wage increases to persons whose earnings are "substandard" or who are in the category of the "working poor."

The new law also requires "exceptions and variations" to the Pay Board standards for various reasons including "gross inequities."

A package of aerospace contracts, negotiated and presented to the Pay Board before it announced its lid on exceptions to the 5.5 percent standard, found board members sharply divided after hearing both employer and union representatives explain and defend the contract provisions.

The board put off showdown on the issue until January.

Similar contracts by the Machinists and Auto Workers with the major aerospace companies provide for first-year increases of about 12 percent in most cases. But both union and employer negotiators told the Pay Board that a substantial portion of the first-year raise represents scheduled cost-of-living increases under a catch-up formula agreed to in 1968 contract negotiations.

Typical of the confusion surrounding Pay Board actions was the on-off announcement of approval of the Railroad Signalmen's recent 42-month contract, which dates back to January 1971. One of its steps was a 5 percent increase, retroactive to Oct. 1—during the period of the 90-day freeze.

The board on Dec. 9 had issued a statement declaring that the entire contract, including the Oct. 1 step, had been approved. A week later, a board official said that was a "mistake" and there was an unresolved question as to whether the Oct. 1 retroactivity was approved. Finally the board agreed that it had in fact approved the retroactive payment.

At a news conference announcing the new limit on exceptions to the 5.5 percent level, Judge George H. Boldt, the board chairman, declared: "The Pay Board is over the hump and on the way to being an effective agency."

The press release on the new standards declared that increases totaling no more than 7 percent will be permitted "where tandem relationships can be proven to exist" and where necessary "to attract or retain essential employes."

In addition—but only in contracts submitted up to Mar. 31, 1972—increases not exceeding 7 percent will be allowed "where pay increases since the beginning of the last prior contract or the aggregate pay increase during the past 36 months has been less than an annual average of 7 percent." In such cases, "the difference between that average and 7 percent may be added to the 5.5 percent standard, not to exceed 7 percent."

The five labor members of the Pay Board released a statement spelling out their proposal for exceptions to the 5.5 percent standard.

The labor proposal, rejected by the board majority, would have permitted "catch-up" increases where the total raise for the workers involved since August 1968 does not exceed an 8.5 percent a year productivity and cost of living standard, plus the 5.5 percent general pay standard.

Also, the labor members said, above-standard raises should be approved based on traditional links to wages paid to other workers in a plant or by other employers.

Likewise, workers should be permitted to negotiate extra wages based on savings to employers from a union concession on work rules, the labor members argued.

In any event, they proposed, there should be no restrictions on wage increases of 25 cents an hour or less. Other exceptions could be granted by the Pay Board where warranted under the labor proposal.

Unit of 1,200 Shifts To Bakery Union

Chicago—Twelve hundred workers at the Curtiss Candy Co. voted in a National Labor Relations Board election to switch their union affiliation to the Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

The employes had been represented by an unaffiliated union in the Chicago area which had been carrying on a series of raids against AFL-CIO unions.

The B&C won the election 552 to 331.

A Sustaining Faith

THE FLAME OF HOPE splutters into the final days of the year, and the way it lights is difficult to discern. In all parts of the world, men and women of good will must wonder—some of them secretly, for the wonder itself may be a crime—how darkness has reconquered so much of this beleaguered planet.

A quarter of a century ago, the world shuddered at the realization that peace had been won at a price more terrible than history had ever known. The family of nations resolved then to organize for the preservation of peace. In a burst of universal gratitude for having at least survived, it projected global programs for combatting the hunger and fears out of which wars originate.

Now, little more than a generation later, the tears and joy, the anguish and hope seem as remote as the Roman Empire. The world is back to its old counting games—counting people, money, square miles, armaments, troops, gross national products, profits.

All inventories are depressing. Our cities are too crowded; our prices and profits are too high; God's gifts of air and water are too polluted. Across the world the children are battered, decimated, starved, mutilated as armies prepare to clash and their leaders spit at each other across frontiers or roar at each other in the council of nations.

YET, LIFE GOES ON. From day to day, from week to week and year to year each one of us enrolled in the ranks of a trade union is thereby proclaiming an insistent, spiritual truth.

Through the cooperative effort to improve the conditions under which they labor, working men and women have demonstrated their devotion to a cause greater than any advantage that is weighed and counted. All other causes, by comparison, seek advantages. Only the trade union movement rests on the belief that no advantage is secure until all share in it.

On the eve of the new year, only the trade union movement is concerned with an equitable and just division of the fruits of production. Its strength lies neither in selfish profiteering nor in powerful conquests; it is rather the result of services rendered and life improved. The entire nation benefits from its benefits.

In this holiday season the wish must be that some conquering vision of such a faith will spread beyond the trade union movement. Until we accomplish improvements in the quality of American life, a happier new year can only be our wish.

National Service Could Test Sincerity of Draft Jumpers

By John P. Roche

DURING WORLD WAR II, several of my militantly anti-war friends refused to serve in the armed forces. Since their objections to the war were political rather than religious in character, they were denied the status of conscientious objectors.

Instead of performing alternative service, they were told to go fight or go to jail. (The special standing of religious objectors always struck me as a curious application of the principle of the separation of church and state.) Being men of deep convictions, they went to jail for the duration plus, in several cases, two or three additional years.

This was brought to mind by the present amnesty campaign for young Americans who jumped the country to avoid service in the Vietnamese war. Sen. George McGovern has called for a blanket pardon—a position greeted enthusiastically on college campuses, but with grim silence elsewhere.

McGovern's implication that, given the character of the war as he sees it, the draft dodgers as the truly moral men has gone down badly. Without getting involved in the theological distinction between a "just" and an "unjust" war, it is safe to say that for most of us an unjust war was one in which we got shot at.

A flat pardon is thus out of the question. But what then should we do about the perhaps 20,000 young Americans (the pro-amnesty forces have been raising the figure; the last time I looked it had almost reached 100,000) who are living abroad, mainly in Canada?

Should we just forget about them, leave them to face the consequences of their decision? That is, in concrete terms, either stay out of the country or come home and go to jail? And what about the few thousand who, like my World War II friends, refused to fight or run and are presently in prison?

Let us deal with the last category first. Those now in prison have demonstrated that they are not spoiled children. They put their convictions on the line and took the consequences of their beliefs. Whether one shares their views or not is irrelevant. They made their witness; they acted like men.

It seems to me that at Christmastide a compassionate step by Pres. Nixon, one that might help to heal the scars of war, would be to commute the sentences of those war resisters currently in prison.

But then we turn to the expatriates. Their outstanding characteristic, one that radically sets them apart from the jailed, is that they have not demonstrated any commitment to anything except their own comfort and safety. Maybe they are pacifists; maybe they are men of principle. But if they want to return to the United States, they have to earn the right to be taken seriously.

WHICH BRINGS US to an extremely sensible proposal put forward by New York's Rep. Edward Koch: that these emigres be permitted to return without criminal sanctions if they will enroll for two years in a national service program—working in hospitals or with the poor or in programs similar to those presently approved for conscientious objectors.

Perhaps this would require an act of Congress, perhaps it could be managed administratively by the Dept. of Justice, but whatever action is necessary should be taken.

My hunch is that most of these young men are not just spoiled irresponsibles for whom the war was merely a pretext for jumping ship. Koch's imaginative proposal would provide us with a way of finding out.

Not All of It Agnewism:

News Media Would Do Well To Take Criticism Seriously

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

"Like many another established institution, the U.S. press tends to suffer criticism badly—even when it comes from within."

I DIDN'T SAY that. Time magazine said it by way of leading into a roundup article on the phenomenal increase, within recent years, in the number of "blunt, angry, and gossipy" magazines aimed at exposing the real or imagined faults of the press.

Time reports that in-house journalism reviews of this type have sprung up in nearly a dozen U.S. cities in the past years. Their performance thus far is said to be uneven, "but editors are beginning to wince as they read."

As an avid newspaper reader, I would say that it's about time that editors—and their counterparts in radio and television—began to wince a bit. They have been leading a sheltered life and, by and large, have been treated with kid gloves for as long as I can remember. And this—as they themselves are properly in the habit of reminding other established institutions in our society, and notably in recent years the church—is bound, in the long run, to take its toll.

In the case of the media, the price of being immune to criticism (or, in Time's phraseology, of suffering criticism badly) is all too evident. Frankly speaking, it makes it extremely difficult for the media to maintain a policy of balanced objectivity—free of prejudice and bias—in their presentation of the news and their treatment of the people who make the news.

In short, it tempts the media to take themselves much too seriously and to ignore—and sometimes even to ridicule—those who may happen to disagree with them.

This isn't true of all the media all the time, but unfortunately it's true of all too many of them some of the time. Those who disagree with this judgment might want to ask themselves if they can ever remember an instance in which the average newspaper or the average television network openly and frankly owned up to a serious misstatement of fact and, more importantly, went to the trouble of publicizing its retraction in such a way as to make absolutely certain that its readers or viewers would catch up with it.

My own experience in this regard has been that the media (which, after all, are made up of human beings just as weak and just as fallible as the rest of us) are seldom willing to admit that they have made a mistake and, even when they do condescend to publish a retraction, are inclined to bury it, so to speak, and consistently refuse to give the "opposition" anything even approaching equal time or equal space.

The standard response to this kind of criticism of the media is to invoke the sacred principle of the freedom of the press, or, in more recent years, to associate all such criticism with the name of Spiro Agnew. That's a convenient ploy—a sophisticated form of guilt by association—but it simply won't wash any longer.

In other words, to say that Mr. Agnew's incessant criticism of the media tends to be much too simplistic and much too intemperate in tone is one thing. But to suggest that other observers should refrain from criticizing the media for fear of playing into the hands of the Vice President and his numerous devotees is arrant nonsense.

ANOTHER WAY of saying the same thing is to point out that the time has come for the media to face up squarely to the obvious fact that what Mr. Agnew has been saying about the media, for his own purposes and from his own political point of view, is being said quite objectively by a lot of other people whose professional credentials are far more impressive than Mr. Agnew's and whose commitment to the principle of freedom of the press simply can't be questioned. Some of these people are "conservative," others are "liberal," and still others are "radical" in their political orientation. Political labels of this type, however, are irrelevant.

In other words, it makes no difference whether Edith Effron and Allen Drury, for example, are "conservatives," whether John Roche, Milton Viorst, and Andrew Hatcher, for example, are "liberals" or whether Dr. George Weinberg, for example, is a "radical." That's neither here nor there.

The fact is that all of these writers—and many others besides—have, within recent weeks, accused certain influential segments of the media of being either seriously deficient in the performance of their public calling or, worse that that, of being deliberately biased in their presentation of the news and their treatment of controversial public figures.

The time has come, it seems to me, for the media to respond to this kind of criticism on its merits. To try to get around it by invoking the principle of the freedom of the press or by raising the spector of Agnewism would be to add insult to injury.

Credibility Gap:

Ability of Price Commission To Check Hikes Held Doubtful

PRICE CONTROLS instituted in the Administration's Phase 2 economic policies lack the credibility to effectively stem the rise in the cost of living, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis charged. Perlis heads organized labor's price watchdog efforts.

Without tight and workable regulation of consumer prices, and enforcement machinery to assure they are obeyed, there is growing doubt that the government "is really serious" about guaranteeing "fair and firm" across-the-board controls on retail prices, fees, rents and interest rates, Perlis said.

To fill the gap, he noted that labor's organization of a force of several thousand price monitors to detect and report violations is well under way, with strong support and cooperation from senior citizen and youth organizations, women and minority groups.

Perlis said that checks are turning up price hikes in a wide range of consumer items. "Utilities have raised their rates, stores have raised prices, landlords have raised rents," he said. He pointed out that there has also been "a reduction of service and a lowering of quality of some of the items on the shelves."

Perlis scored the makeup of the Price Commission as "a body that is more inclined to go along with corporate interests than it is with the rank-and-file of American people." Stressing that Pres. Nixon failed to name either a consumer or a union representative to the commission, he said that no one on the panel "truly speaks for the consumers . . . and workers of this country."

Perlis acknowledged that organized labor's local price monitors face a tough job, particularly in view of the commission's allowances of increases "on an aggregate basis," which means that retailers, manufacturers and wholesalers themselves determine "which items are going to be raised, kept at the same rate or even lowered."

And, he predicted, "if prices are not kept under control . . . there will be the biggest consumer revolt ever in this country."

Perlis was questioned on Labor News Conference by James F. Welsh of the Washington Evening Star and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The interview program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

THE CLEAR AND PRESENT danger of money dominating and controlling presidential elections has never been more a political reality than today.

For a time before it recessed for the Christmas vacation, Congress moved to head off the control of elections by a small clique of the wealthy in a way similar to the procedure followed in other democratic countries. The federal government would actually finance campaign spending.

The proposal was neither radical nor innovative. It has kicked around Congress for some years. It would permit taxpayers to check off, on their income tax form, whether they were willing to contribute $1 of their taxes toward financing presidential campaigns.

Major political parties would be entitled to $20.4 million for the campaign, providing they did not accept money from other sources.

The plan, as an amendment to the tax bill, passed the Senate by a 52 to 47 vote. The prospects were good in the House until the Democratic leadership, in a startling shift, threw in the sponge. It accepted a so-called compromise that established the principle, but for the 1976 elections. Little more than that was accomplished.

Behind this sudden capitulation was the decision of the White House to veto the entire tax bill and scuttle major Nixon economic programs if the campaign expenditure checkoff was included.

The Democratic leadership was convinced that the Administration was ready to scuttle its entire economic program to preserve its monetary dominance in presidential politics. They gave up the financing plan rather than risk blame for an economic catastrophe.

That the Administration was willing to sacrifice so much to keep the financing provisions out of the tax bill should not come as a surprise to close students of political science. It was explained to a strategy meeting of White House aides and Republican House leaders, just prior to Thanksgiving, by Rep. William Springer (R-Ill.). As reported by Washington Post, Springer said:

"The Democrats feel that they could beat Nixon with this $20 million from the Treasury and they might be right. This issue will decide the 1972 elections. After all, (Hubert) Humphrey almost turned it around with only $2 million in television commercials during the last 10 days of the 1968 campaign."

THE ROLE OF MONEY is seen in this report filed by the Federal Communications Commission on spending for radio and television in recent presidential campaigns:

Year	Republicans	Democrats	Total
1968	$22,504,858	$15,447,989	$40,403,498
1964	13,032,575	11,012,626	24,603,989
1960	7,558,809	6,204,986	14,195,278
1956	5,381,881	4,120,712	9,818,342

Congressional Quarterly made a study of the 1968 campaign contributions. Official reports, says CQ, are always understated, but made these disclosures:

- Reports on 46 of the 66 richest individuals in the United States disclose that they gave $1,459,502 in the presidential race—13 to 1 going to the Republicans.
- In reports from 23 percent of 1,013 officers and directors of 25 largest corporations, 219 gave $782,839 to the GOP and only 26 gave $132,180 to the Democrats.
- Officials of companies ranking among 25 top defense, space and nuclear firms gave at least $1,235,412—favoring the Republicans over the Democrats by 3-to-1.

Just a few rich Republican families financed a good part of the 1968 GOP campaign: the Mellons gave the GOP $249,000; the Rockefellers gave $551,000; the Whitneys, $93,000 and W. Clement Stone, the Chicago insurance executive, $200,000. And these reported figures—just a sample—are all on the low side.

The campaign reform bill would ease the situation to a minimum degree, but vast sums of money by a few wealthy people will still dominate the 1972 presidential election.

PRICE CONTROLS without "fair and firm" enforcement stand little chance of holding down the rising cost of living in Phase 2, Leo Perlis, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Services, was questioned by James F. Welsh, left, of the Washington Evening Star and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine.

Freeze, Controls Shape Key '71 Issues

By Duane Emme

When 1970 drew to a close, an analysis of major events in the first year of a new decade described it as the "year of the big squeeze."

The second year of the decade—1971—can best be characterized as the "year of the big freeze," in the light of Pres. Nixon's sudden imposition of wage-price controls.

But the "freeze" so far has had little effect on the "squeeze," as prices continue to climb and "real" wages suffer, the economy drags and unemployment remains high.

To labor, Nixon's Phase 2 control program seemed clearly designed to make workers and their unions the scapegoat for the Administration's economic policy failures.

Thus, the events of 1971 set the stage for the 1972 presidential election. The AFL-CIO made clear it would mount the greatest registration-and-vote drive in history to help elect progressive candidates for national office.

Eighteen-year-olds were given the right to vote under a constitutional amendment ratified in 1971, and labor launched a program to help them get registered and enlist them in a labor, youth and civil rights coalition.

On the bargaining front, Steelworkers achieved gains with a last-minute, strike averting settlement. Railroad unions won the right to selective strikes and scored other breakthroughs. Communications Workers, Mine Workers and Electrical Workers won strikes.

Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black died and Justice John M. Harlan retired, giving Nixon two more appointments to the high court. He took to national television to announce his appointments as "judicial conservatives" cut in his own image.

Following, from the files of Press Associates, Inc. is a month-by-month review of 1971:

January

Living costs continue to climb . . . Meany says full employment is a "must" in the new year . . . Trained inspectors are critical need under job safety law . . . For Anti-Union Clients:

Poll Results Linked To Biased Questions

tional Right to Work Committee, the business-supported lobbying group and propaganda outfit for laws to prohibit union shop agreements. Opinion Research Corp. interviewers asked for agreement or disagreement with the following statement:

"No American should be forced against his will to join a church, union or political organization."

Only slightly more subtle was the loaded question that led the polling firm to issue a press release a week after the AFL-CIO convention announcing that "63 percent of the nation's union families disapprove of the convention's treatment of the President."

The question that elicited this response—following a raft of White House inspired news stories that left the impression that Pres. Nixon was practically hooted out of the convention hall—asked:

"Do you approve or disapprove of the reportedly hostile reception that George Meany and other labor leaders gave to Pres. Nixon when he addressed their convention on Friday?"

And the nationwide survey of "the nation's union families" consisted of some 370 telephone calls that were answered by anyone over the age of 18 in a family that included a union member.

A correspondent for Press Associates, Inc., asked the firm who had paid for the poll and was told by an Opinion Research Corp. spokesman that "the contractor specified it wants to remain anonymous."

As for the reason why the polling firm was distributing the results of its surveys to union publications around the country, the reply was that it was part of Opinion Research's effort "to become better known."

The same poll purported to find that union families had switched from opposition to support of Pres. Nixon's economic policies — although not to the extent of the general public.

Republican sources trumpeted the results of the Opinion Research Corp. poll—as they have previous proclamations by the same outfit.

This was in marked contrast to the official silence with regard to the unusual opinion survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau at the request of the Administration to determine public attitudes towards the effectiveness and fairness of the wage-price freeze.

That government-sponsored survey found that less than one-third of union members thought the freeze had been fair to all groups.

It was the first time a government survey had ever asked a respondent if he or she were a union member. And if, as was widely believed, the intent was to show union members as out of step with their leadership, it obviously backfired. The Administration didn't even bother putting out a press release on the results.

In addition to the National Right to Work Committee and the Republican National Committee, the list of presumably satisfied past clients of Opinion Research Corp. includes the conservative-oriented Farm Bureau, the National Association of Manufacturers, the Goldwater campaign organization and such big corporations as General Motors, General Electric, Standard Oil and U.S. Steel.

Congressmen and senators have at various times accused the firm of using "loaded" questions to elicit a desired response.

Former ILPA President Fred Sweet Dies at 62

St. Paul, Minn.—Frederick B. Sweet, past president of the International Labor Press Association and retired editor of the St. Paul Union Advocate, died Dec. 17 at Midway Hospital here following a long illness with emphysema. He was 62.

Sweet spent most of his working life as a newspaperman, starting as editor of a country weekly at Mt. Gilead, O., in 1940. His experiences in Mt. Gilead are retold in a chapter of Studs Terkel's book, Hard Times.

He served on a number of labor publications, including the Catering Industry Employe, the magazine of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes in Cincinnati, which he edited for 18 years.

He was elected to a two-year term as ILPA president in 1967 before taking the editorship of the St. Paul Union Advocate in November of that year. His editorials in the Union Advocate drew nationwide attention and numerous awards. They won the best editorial award in the annual ILPA competition for labor papers for the past three years in succession. He continued to write a column for the paper after retiring as editor last June.

He was born May 10, 1909, in Adrian, Mich., the son of Dr. Franklin W. Sweet, a Baptist minister, and Mary Stevens Sweet.

Survivors include his wife, Eldred; two daughters, Marni of Chicago and Mrs. Lyle Cane of Cincinnati; two sons, David of Santa Cruz, Calif., and John of Atlanta; a brother and three sisters.

Memorial services were held Dec. 20 at the First Unitarian Church, Minneapolis. The family prefers that memorials be in the form of contributions to progressive political candidates.

Promotion Kits Developed for Label Drive

The Union Label & Service Trades Dept. has developed a package of promotional items to encourage consumers to buy union-made American products.

These promotional kits, which include bumper stickers, balloons, plastic tote bags, buttons and other items, are available to all AFL-CIO organizations at a nominal charge.

In a letter to all affiliates and state and central bodies, Union Label Sec.-Treas. Edward P. Murphy said the effective promotion of the "Build America—Buy Union" program is vital element in labor's efforts to preserve American jobs.

As the first priority, Murphy stressed, the trade unionist and his family must be encouraged when shopping to look for the union label and the union service button.

Shoppers also should be made aware that a product is made in the United States and under fair labor conditions, he added.

Additional information and a price list for the union label promotional kits may be obtained from the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Fringe Benefits Mount As Share of Hourly Pay

Paced by union-negotiated health, welfare and retirement programs, fringe benefits accounted for a growing percentage of hourly compensation during 1970, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported in its third biennial survey of workers' compensation.

Private, nonfarm employes' wages and fringes averaged $4.54 an hour—an increase of 65 cents or 17 percent from the 1968 level—but pay for working time actually declined from 82.8 percent to 81.9 percent of hourly compensation.

This was because pay for at least three other types of compensation grew at a faster pace:

- Employer contributions for life insurance and health benefit programs, which rose from 3.7 percent to 4.2 percent of the total compensation package.
- Retirement payments by employers, which rose from 6 to 6.5 percent.
- Paid leave time, which accounted for 5.6 percent of hourly pay as opposed to 5.3 percent in 1968.

Pay for working time, at $3.72 an hour was up 50 cents, but as the BLS noted "only the straight-time pay component advanced; premium pay for overtime, weekend, holiday and late-shift work remained at 9 cents an hour, reflecting the effects of the economic downturn during 1970."

Employer expenditures for retirement programs, the second largest element of compensation after pay for working time, amounted to 29 cents an hour. Increased payments for social security, reflecting increases in both the tax rate and earnings base, were matched by a boost in expenditures for private retirement programs.

"Together, they yielded an increase since 1968 of 5 cents an hour, or almost 21 percent, in overall expenditures for retirement programs," the BLS said.

Pay for leave time, with the exception of sick leave, at 25 cents an hour, was up 4 cents from the 1968 level. Vacation pay accounted for 15 cents of the total and for 3 cents of the increase.

Employer payments for life insurance and health benefit programs averaged 19 cents an hour, 4 cents higher than 1968. Expenditures for these programs rose 27 percent during the two-year period, more than any other compensation element, underscoring increased costs of the programs, expanded coverage and benefit improvements.

Employer expenditures for unemployment benefit programs, 4 cents, nonproduction bonuses, 4 cents, and savings and thrift plants, 1 cent an hour, were unchanged from their 1968 levels.

Manufacturing employes led nonmanufacturing employes in wages, with manufacturing workers earning an average of $4.36 an hour in 1970 as compared to $3.86, although the increase for both was 66 cents an hour.

Compensation for office workers, including executive, administrative and professional employes as well as clerks, came to $5.79, exceeding by $1.91 the level of $3.88 paid nonoffice workers.

Pay for leave time was substantially higher for office than for nonoffice workers—37 cents compared with 19 cents an hour.

Major Bills Bottled Up:

Congress Gains Curtailed By Nixon Vetoes, Threats

for a free hand on economic control powers for another year—in light of Nixon's broken promises on the current program.

As the price for extension of economic control authority, it voted to approve retroactive payment of nearly all pay and benefit increases that were denied workers during the 90-day wage freeze. And it directed that a pay raise for federal employes be put into effect on Jan. 1, as originally scheduled. Nixon had attempted to postpone the increase until July so that federal employes would "set an example" to the rest of the nation.

- A pair of labor-supported bills aimed at overcoming the nation's shortage of doctors, nurses, dentists and other health professionals received overwhelming congressional approval—even though they called for substantially more federal aid than the Nixon Administration had sought. The AFL-CIO termed the expanded program a vitally-needed "tooling-up" for a national health security program.
- Nixon killed with a slashing veto message an important new program of quality day care services for children of working mothers. The President shocked even some of his own supporters on the issue by parroting the objections of some of the most extreme right-wing groups that day care programs meeting educational, nutrition and health goals would somehow destroy parental influence and "communalize" children.

Not every congressional action, of course, was the result of a tug of war between the Administration and Congress.

There was general agreement on a constitutional amendment granting 18-year-olds the vote in all elections. And the amendment was ratified by the states in record time.

Likewise, there was no quarrel with the overwhelming repeal of a repugnant 1950 law that gave the government the right to hold suspected subversives in detention camps without trial during times of emergency. Just 21 years before, Congress had overriden Pres. Truman's veto of the legislation that included the detention camp provision.

There was quarrel—and concern—with a number of presidential appointments. But this year—as compared with past years—the Senate went along with the President, although with notable lack of enthusiasm.

The closest vote was the 51-44 confirmation of Earl L. Butz as Secretary of Agriculture—despite farm state resentment at his corporate "agribusiness" ties and his association with the unpopular Ezra Taft Benson regime during the Eisenhower Administration.

The President also had his way on the appointment of William H. Rehnquist to the Supreme Court—over the opposition of civil rights and labor groups. And the largely honorary post of Treasurer of the United States went to a woman whose California factory had repeatedly been raided by U.S. immigration agents as an employer of illegal border-crossers.

These actions, too, were taken during the first session of the 92nd Congress:

A labor-supported bill was enacted providing up to 13 additional weeks of federal unemployment benefits in states with the highest jobless rates.

In a rare case in which the Administration and labor were both on the losing side of an issue, Congress ended all funding for the supersonic transport plane. But it did provide some help to another segment of the depressed aerospace industry by voting a loan guarantee to keep Lockheed Aircraft Corp. from going under.

America's foreign aid program barely survived a parliamentary tangle that delayed adjournment of Congress. At one stage the Senate voted to kill the entire program. Then senators and congressmen struggled for weeks to put the pieces back together before reaching a minimum consensus to continue funding the present program and put off policy decisions until the second session.

As was the case in the 91st Congress, the House passed a welfare reform bill that was close to the version Pres. Nixon had proposed—and inadequate in a number of areas in labor's view. But the Senate Finance Committee was still struggling to reach a consensus on the legislation, which also includes a number of social security and health care changes. Meanwhile, in a fast shuffle during the adjournment rush, Congress voted quick approval to a bill imposing the mandatory work requirements of the welfare reform legislation — but omitting the income guarantees.

A so-called "women's rights" constitutional amendment again passed the House in a form that the AFL-CIO warned could nullify hard-won legislation protecting women workers. But no action is likely in the Senate.

The House approved a bill to establish an independent consumer agency. And the Senate voted down a proposal to allow meat that has not been federally inspected to be sold in interstate commerce. But the Senate also took an already weak fish inspection bill and made it even weaker through an amendment that brought it in line with a token program backed by the Nixon Administration.

A bill backed by labor and civil rights groups to give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission enforcement power to crack down on job discrimination was sidetracked by the House. In its place, the House substituted a toothless Administration version backed by employer organizations. The next move is up to the Senate.

A sense of Congress resolution, which does not have the force of law, expressed the near-unanimous desire of Congress to keep the U.S. Public Health Service hospitals and health centers open at least through the current fiscal year. Labor strongly supported the effort to keep the Administration from closing out the program.

Virtually certain of final enactment when Congress reconvenes on Jan. 18 is a campaign reform bill already approved by a House-Senate conference committee. It imposes a spending limit on all candidates for public office, including restrictions on radio and television broadcasting. Pres. Nixon last year vetoed a bill designed to curb broadcasting expenditures, but is expected to sign the new and broader legislation. The bill also clarifies labor's rights to carry on political education programs.

Congress refused to give serious consideration to Nixon's proposal to reshuffle virtually all government departments. And if any form of revenue-sharing legislation reaches the House floor, it is expected to bear only a distant relationship to the Administration's proposals.

Despite White House prodding, neither the House nor the Senate gave any support to the President's compulsory arbitration proposals for labor disputes in the transportation industry.

As far as the Nixon Administration is concerned, the first session of the 92nd Congress gave little cause for rejoicing according to a White House official quoted in U.S. News & World Report.

The Administration's first session effort, he said, was devoted largely to stopping legislation opposed by the Administration.

"Let's face it," he added. "The Nixon program hasn't gotten anywhere this year to speak of."

Court Upholds Refusal to do Struck Work

Boston—The 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here has upheld the right of an employe to refuse to perform struck work even though in this case, the employe was working during a strike.

The court upheld an order of the National Labor Relations Board for the reinstatement of the employe. The board found that her dismissal was improper because she did not know when she crossed the picket line that she would be transferred from a regular clerical job to struck production work.

The court ruled that the company, General Tire & Rubber had not proven that she had this knowledge and declared that "she should not have been required to take a position until the full facts were brought home to her."

Albert Pledges Congress To Full Employment Goal

House Speaker Carl Albert served notice on the Nixon Administration that the Democratic-controlled Congress will continue to take the initiative to get the economy rolling and the jobless back to work.

Albert credited congressional prodding with pushing Pres. Nixon away from his "deliberate slowdown" of the economy.

During the first session, Albert noted, Democrats took the initiative to increase funds for education, housing, public works, health and veterans benefits.

And, the Oklahoma congressman stressed, if the President continues to drag his feet, Congress is "ready to take further initiatives as required to bring our economy back to full prosperity and full employment."

Rejecting Administration arguments that the nation can't afford new programs, Albert told newsmen: "We believe the way to get the economy in balance is to get more people to work and get more people on the tax rolls."

Major '72 Bargaining To Affect 2.8 Million

About 2.8 million workers are covered by major collective bargaining agreements that are due to expire in 1972 or are reopenable on wages, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

This compares with 4.75 million workers under contracts expiring in both 1970 and 1971. The BLS noted, however, that the number of workers covered by deferred wage increases and escalator clauses will be "substantially" higher next year than in 1971.

Latest analysis of the 1972 collective bargaining picture shows negotiations due in construction, apparel, retail trade, services, transportation equipment and food.

"Unlike 1970, when settlements were concluded in the automobile and trucking industries, or 1971, when agreements were reached in steel and communications industries, no particular settlement seems likely to dominate bargaining in 1972," the BLS said.

One of the largest contracts to be negotiated covers 40,000 members of the Retail Clerks who will be dealing with California employers. Second largest, covering 36,000, will be negotiated by the Ladies' Garment Workers and New York City firms in June.

Other large agreements will cover 23,000 members of the Television & Radio Artists and 22,000 workers covered in agreements under negotiation by the Screen Actors Guild.

Deferred wage increases are scheduled to go into effect next year for some 6.7 million workers. They will average 6.1 percent, or 29 cents an hour. Deferred increases in 1971 covered 5.3 million and averaged 7.8 percent, according to the BLS.

In manufacturing, 3.6 million workers are due to receive deferred increases averaging 4.4 percent, while in non-manufacturing the average increase will be 8.1 percent for 3.1 million workers, most of them in construction and transportation.

A number of these deferred increases are above the 5.5 percent guide set by the Pay Board and could come under the board's scrutiny. Under current board rules, however, they can go into effect unless they are challenged, case by case, by five members of the board or by one of the parties to the contract.

More workers under major contracts will be covered by cost-of-living clauses in 1972 than in any previous year, according to the BLS. About 3 million workers were covered at the beginning of 1971 with about 1.3 million more to be added in 1972.

5 Unionists on Jobless Benefit Advisory Panel

Five labor representatives are among the appointees to the newly formed 16-member Federal Advisory Council on Unemployment Insurance, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson announced.

The tripartite panel of employe, employer and public members will make recommendations to the Secretary for improvements and changes in the unemployment insurance system. It will meet at least twice a year to review the federal-state program.

The labor members appointed to the council are James O'Brien, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security; J. Bill Becker, president of the Arkansas AFL-CIO; Lee W. Minton, president-emeritus of the Glass Bottle Blowers; Kenneth Morris, Auto Workers, and Abraham Weiss, Teamsters.
